A POOR man that would save his soul alive is reduced to the sad necessity of sharply trying his gods, whether they are divine or not; which is a terrible pass for mankind, and lays an awful problem upon each man. The man must do it, however. At his own peril he will have to do this problem too, which is one of the awfullest; and his neighbors, all but a most select portion of them, portion generally not clad in official tiaras, can be of next to no help to him in it—nay, will rather infinitely hinder him in it, as matters go.—Carlyle.

WHAT do you suppose creation is?
What do you suppose will satisfy the soul but to walk free and own no superior?
What do you suppose I would intimate to you in a hundred ways, but that man or woman is as good as God?
And that there is no God any more divine than yourself?
And that that is what the oldest and newest myths finally mean?
And that you or any one must approach creations through such laws?
—Walt Whitman.

It may be argued that happiness comes from activity, and hence, except there were wrong and misery in the world, there would be no field for the exercise of man's noblest faculties, and so no means for his highest happiness; in a word, perfection would be stagnation. Well, by the theory, God is perfect. Is he stagnant? Besides, if the alternatives only were possible to the Supreme, either to introduce wrong and misery as excitants of man's faculties or to leave him, after creation, a stupid, inert clod, would not supreme intelligence and benevolence have insisted that he be left uncreated altogether?—John Francis Smith.

You say let them begin first. You say we cannot disarm until they do. I say No! We can. I say it is with us to lead the van. It is with us to begin. It is with us to announce to the nations of the world, that are still quivering under the reign of the effete notions of antiquity: "Here we stand in our ancient renown that needs no vindication—in our justice, in our moderation, prepared to submit to peaceable arbitration every question between ourselves and our brethren; and you may go on in your games of war; you may go on and construct your ironclads; increase your artillery and infantry and musketry—the United States is too great, too modern, to sink to the level of the military notions of the ancient world.—Hon. William M. Everett.

TERRITORY, conquest, diplomatic subtlety, political unscrupulousness, are no proofs of advance, and may be wide-open doors to deterioration. It is not enough for a nation or for an individual simply to be born, but it is necessary that birth should promise and index expanding opportunities. Nations should outshine precedent nations. Children should outpace parents. Civilization has hideous features under its mask. Time, with kindly but impartial palms, will smooth the frailties away. The mask will be thrown aside. The conceit of a military "civilization" is only of passing consequence. Notwithstanding the papers, the real elements of Japanese civilization belong to a period prior to this war and reside in elements which this war outraged. These elements will live on into her future, long after her diplomacies and cannon are dust.—Horace L. Traubel.

READ AND GIVE TO YOUR FRIENDS.

Mailed singly for 10 cents each; twelve of any one, or an assortment of twelve, for $1.

AN ANTIDOTE ANALYZED. Reply to a Christian who had attacked Freethinkers, and exposing the inconsistency of Christians generally. H. C. Luse.

BIBLE TEMPERANCE. Showing that Liquor Drinking is Commended, Defended, and Enjoined by the Bible. Edwin C. Walker.

CHRISTIANITY A REWARD FOR CRIME. Authenticated by the Bible. O. B. Whitford, M.D.

DID MAN FALL? Is the Garden of Eden a Fact? Israel W. Groh.

EPIDEMIC DELUSIONS. A Lecture by Frederic R. Marvin, M.D. Giving reasonable reasons for Religious and other Delusions.

FALSE CLAIMS OF THE CHURCH. John E. Remsburg's most noted work, and one of the most effective ever written by any Freethinker.

FIRST EPISTLE OF BENNETT THE APOSTLE TO THE TRUTH SEEKERS.

Written while journeying in and near the land of Yabveh. Containing the best moral instructions of the world from the great teachers of the former ages. D. M. Bennett.

THE GIANT DELUSION. A paper read before the Freethought International Congress at Chicago. One of Otto Wettstein's fraternal attacks on Spiritualism.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY. To which is added a poem on Thomas Paine. One of Samuel P. Putnam's most brilliant lectures. Every Christian who asks the idiotic question, "What Has Infidelity Done?" should be induced to read this book, if he has to be paid to do it.

HOW CAN WE BE SAVED? Was Jesus Supernaturally Conceived, and did he Rise from the Dead? Israel W. Groh.

INGERSOLL AND JESUS. Showing how the two agree. A poem by Samuel P. Putnam.

THE LIMITATIONS OF TOLERATION.

A discussion between Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic R. Coudert, Ex-Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, before the Nineteenth Century Club of New York. "Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him." Colonel Ingersoll maintains this, the others deny it. Mr. Coudert is a Roman Catholic, Mr. Woodford a Protestant.

MATERIALISM: Its History, and Its Influence Upon Society. Dr. Louis Buchner.

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE WORKERS. A Consideration of the Marvels and Miracles of the New Testament. One of John Peck's best books.

MOSES BEFORE THE COURT, or The Forgery of the Old Testament. Dedicated to the Clergy. H. J. Seignuret, M.D.

THE NEW GOD. "It is an open secret that man has always made his Gods. They exist in and through him, as the image exists in and through the mirror. Take away man and you take away God—the image vanishes." This pamphlet, therefore, is a consideration of what kind of a God man should make. Samuel P. Putnam.

ORTHODOXY. A lecture by Colonel

Robert G. Ingersoll, and one of that great man's best. The subjects considered are: Orthodox Religion Dying Out, Religious Deaths and Births, The Religion of Reciprocity, Mohammed, The Destruction of Art, The Discovery of America, Copernicus and Kepler, Charles Darwin, Special Providence, The Latest Creed, God as a Governor, The Love of God, The Fall of Man, The Atonement, The Second Birth, Inspiration, The Reign of Truth and Love, The Wars It Brought, The Resurrection, The Judgment-Day, Pious Evasions, "No Bible, No Civilization," Miracles of the New Testament, The Ascension, Casting out Devils, Necessity of Belief, Eternal Punishment, Some who Are Damned, What I Believe, Immortality. This lecture is on the famous text, "The Clergy know that I know that they do not know."

PERSONAL EXISTENCE AFTER DEATH.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS MASS MEETING AT LINCOLN HALL, WASHINGTON. Being the Speeches of Hon. FREDERICK DOUGLASS and Col. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL on the Decision of the United States Court that the Civil Rights Act is Unconstitutional. Fifty-three large octavo pages, of which Colonel Ingersoll's speech occupies 33 pages.

PULPIT, PEW, AND CRADLE. So long as the Pulpit speaks to believing Pews composed chiefly of mothers, the cradle will be rocked by ghosts and the race will remain on its knees to a devil of its own creation and to a God who is powerless against him. One of Helen Gardner's brightest efforts.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY BETTER THAN ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. M. Babcock.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS. One of L. K. Washburn's best lectures, and it is, like all of his, very good.

THE ROARING LION ON THE TRACK. One of M. Babcock's comical sermons.

SCIENCE vs. RELIGION, or The Conflict Between Reason and Superstition. T. C. Widdcombe.

ST. MATTHEW BEFORE THE COURT. Presenting the evidence of the forgery of his alleged gospel. H. J. Seignuret.

SISTER LUCY AND HER AWFUL DISCLOSURES REGARDING NEW HALL CONVENT. Showing that Convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom.

SPIRITUALISM FROM A MATERIALISTIC STANDPOINT. B. F. Underwood. Written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK. Torture Implements Employed in the 15th and 16th centuries for the promulgation of Christianity. Being the Nuremberg Collection, with specimens from the Holy Inquisition. 28 pictures. The descriptions and reflections by George E. Macdonald.

VICTOR HUGO'S ORATION ON VOLTAIRE, delivered on the one hundredth anniversary of Voltaire's death. Translated by James Parton, author of the Life of Voltaire. To which are added the three great poems of Goethe, George Eliot, and Longfellow.

WAS CHRIST CRUCIFIED? Austin Bierbower. A lawyer's consideration of the evidence of that alleged event.

WAS JESUS INSANE? A consideration of Christ's alleged acts which would lead one to that conclusion. L. K. Washburn.

WHY DON'T HE LEND A HAND? And other Agnostic Poems. Samuel P. Putnam. The title poem is perhaps the most popular of Mr. Putnam's many poems, and a great many editions of it have been called for. The other poems are: The Golden Age, The Ideal and the Real, Not Dead, but Living, Fruition, Hope, Thomas Paine, Nature's Gospel, Address to Deity, and the short poem so often recited with great effect by Charles Watts, Give Us Light.

WILL THE COMING MAN WORSHIP GOD? B. F. Underwood; written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

WOMAN: FOUR CENTURIES OF PROGRESS. A lecture delivered at the Freethinkers' International Congress at Chicago. Considering: The Cause of Woman's Subjugation, The Canon Law and Its Effects Upon Her, Theology Never Helpful to Woman, Invention Woman's Friend, Freethought the Benefactor of Woman. Susan H. Wixon.

WOMAN: HER PAST AND PRESENT, HER RIGHTS AND WRONGS. A lecture delivered before the Woman Suffrage Association of Denver, Col., by B. F. Underwood.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

"In the nature of things there can be no evidence to establish the claim of inspiration." Such is the text of the Colonel's new lecture entitled

All About the Holy Bible

Just published in a large and handsome pamphlet. Price 25 cents. Address The Truth Seeker Co., New York.

The Great Ingersoll Controversy

Containing the famous Christmas Sermon by Colonel Ingersoll, the protests thereby evoked from the ministers who think they own this country and all therein, and Colonel Ingersoll's replies to the same. A finely gotten up pamphlet. Price, 25 cents.

Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

LINCOLN

This is Colonel INGERSOLL's great lecture, printed in a handsome pamphlet, and containing the Century's famous portrait of Lincoln—said to be the best extant. Price, 25 cents.

SHAKSPERE

"An intellectual ocean, whose waves touched all the shores of thought." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with likeness of Shakspeare from the Kesselstadt death mask. Price, 25 cents.

Travels in Faith.

PIANOS, PIANOS!

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STECK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

J. E. REMSBURG & SON, Atchison, Kan.

Not for Parsons.

"BLESSED is he who" commits murder and is hanged, "for he shall be rewarded in heaven."

Two old ladies were talking about the churches. One said: "What is the difference between all these denominations, anyway?" "Why," replied the other, "the Methodists, they go down in the gutter and pulls them up; the Baptists, they washes them, and the Congregationalists, they starches them."

An English clergyman was preaching in a country church in Scotland. He had as his subject "The Prodigal Son." "And the prodigal son went away from his poor old father and remained in a far country for years and years and years and years, and his father mourned his absence for years and years. But after years and years he came back to his poor old father, and his poor old father said to his servants, bring forth the fatted calf which has been kept for my son these years and years." An old farmer in the audience could restrain himself no longer. "Yer er le'er; calf wud hav bin a coo," he exclaimed.

WHEN Joe Jefferson was here not long ago, as is his custom, he added to his fund of good stories one that he picked up from ex-speaker Tom Reed, who tells it with inimitable humor. Reed's story is about an old farmer, who had some neighbors at dinner with him. Among them was a stranger, who looked like a Baptist preacher. As is the custom in the rural districts when there is a preacher at the table, the farmer looked at him and said: "Brother, will you ask a blessing?" The stranger leaned forward, put his hand to his ear and assumed an inquiring expression of countenance. The farmer renewed the invitation. The stranger said: "I see that you're talking to me, but the fact is, I'm so d—d deaf, I can't hear a word you say."—Washington Post.

THE MISSOURIAN,
Tough luck? Well, I reckon. Say, mister,
You kin talk about women an' wine,
Busted fortunes, dead love, and sich troubles,
But they ain't a greased patching to mine.
I started one summer fer Kansas,
An' out from Mizzoory we rid;
There wuz me an' ole Bose an' Ma'am Sally,
The wagon, the team, an' the kid.

Ole Bose he kep' under the tailgate,
Tied up with a hitchin'-strap thar,
Jist joggin' along unconcerned-like,
With his eye on the bucket o' tar.
An' nights, when we pulled up fer supper,
Ma'am Sally a candle would take An' read suthin' out o' her Bible
Permissus, fer Jesus's sake.

But all of a sudden Ma'am Sally,
Afore we could get to the farms,
Tuck sick—she had kind o' been failin'—
An' she up an' died in my arms.
An' I buried her thar on a hillside,
With nary a word nor a prayer,
For I had a suspicion that Jesus
Wasn't dealin' with me on the square.

So I slewed the team 'round fer Mizzoory,
An' down in some timber a log
Threwed the wagon clean out o' her balance
An' a hind wheel run over the dog.
I jumped—but too late—as he hollered;
An' he tried, like a soldier, to stand;
He whined an' his tail wagged a little,
An' he died thar a-lickin' my hand.

I planted him; got in the wagon,
An' on for Mizzoory we slid,
With me a-skeered somethin' would happen,
Afore we got home, to the kid;

For a man is too awkward and clumsy
To tend to a youngster, you see,
But just about how much I loved him
No feller kin reckon 'cep' me.

At first he would cry fer Ma'am Sally
When I tuck him an' put on his clog,
An' when we would tie up fer dinner
Why then he'd git cryin' fer Bose;
An' he didn't tech much of his vittles,
An' one daybreak he looked awful white,

Deafness Cannot Be Cured

by local applications as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars; free. F. J. CHENEY & CO., Toledo, O. Sold by Druggists, 75c.

I ketched him an' rubbed him an' kissed him,
But he'd gone up the flume in the night.
Then I hitched up 'thout eatin' or drinkin'
And traveled, the kid on my knees,
An' druv till I reached the old homestead,
Straight up to the oak hitchin' trees;
An' my people they come out a-pilin',
Their faces as white as the snow,
An' they bust out a-cryin' an' sobbin'
To see me a-settin' thar so.

An' now they ain't nothin' kin tech me;
No trouble kin git me to wine:
I'm plum through with lovin' an' hatin'
An' I'm waitin' 'fer death ever since;
An' I ain't ben a-doin' no bendin'
To an orthodox chastenin' rod,
Fer religion is all monkey-moonshine,
An' I ain't got no truck with a God.

FOR SALE

AT ABOUT ONE-HALF VALUE.

A small farm of 10 acres 86 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water, good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes walk of the railroad station, 9 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes walk.

The place is especially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1,000 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest, overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

THE PLACE CAN BE BOUGHT FOR $3,500.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of his volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

It is the lightest gas now known, and may solve the problem of aerial navigation. Argon yields a light that seems to explain the aurora borealis. Helium is possessed of highly explosive qualities.

A BROOKLYN lawyer—prominent in wordy defense of "wage slaves"—recently secured an order from court giving him as a fee $7,244.85 out of an award of $13,000 damages to his client, a poor girl. When the newspapers censured him for the act he came out with an attempted "explanation," in which he said: "I think my services were worth fully what I got, if not more. I wish the newspapers would leave my little ewe lamb alone," to which a New York paper retorts that he should not shear his ewe lambs so close as to make them bleed.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

What a New Subscriber, Who Has Received His Pictorial Text-Book, Says of It.

LAMAR, Mo., May 8, 1895.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is received, and after a careful examination of the work I unhesitatingly pronounce it one of the most impressive Freethought works ever issued from the press. It will indeed "corner the parson" and all his flock, and I shall take great pleasure in showing the book to my orthodox friends. As a reference book it is invaluable, and it should find a place in every Freethinker's library.

Jesus Christ, Formerly of Galilee, Claimant.

The Christian Reformer says that our government deliberately rejected the claims of Christ when Congress last year refused to favorably consider the Morse-Frye joint resolution for an amendment to the national Constitution recognizing the divinity and authority of God, Jesus, and the Bible. Inasmuch as the government has no commission to either accept or reject the claims of Christ, or those of any other god or demigod, it must be assumed that the failure of Congress to adopt the resolution mentioned was in effect, whatever it may have been in intention, a declination to pass judgment upon those claims. While the adoption of the resolution would have been an unconstitutional acceptance of the said claims, the failure to act upon it, or the defeat of it, cannot be rightly understood as a rejection thereof, but simply as a formal recognition of the fact that Congress had no right to give judgment upon a religious question. Concluding its lugubrious plaint, the Reformer says:

"Guilt of such rejection rested on the nation and its government before. Increased guilt rests especially on the government now, and doubtless this guilt will be intensified as Christ's claims are more and more clearly pressed upon the government and the nation by faithful witnesses to the truth. May God incline the government and the nation to kiss the Son lest he be angry and they perish from the way when his wrath is kindled but a little."

Three questions suggest themselves at this point: 1. Is there any great difference between the depths of superstition in which the Covenanter is plunged who tells us we must kiss Jesus lest he get angry and smash everything, and that in which the "heathen" is buried who thinks it necessary to sacrifice something on the altar of his god to avert the latter's wrath? 2. Do these educated men at the head of the National Reform movement really believe this antiquated nonsense? 3. Will any of our national lawmakers be frightened, by this invoking of the bogey man, into sacrificing the liberties of the people for the benefit of ambitious sectarists? It is greatly to be feared that the answer to the last question must be Yes.

There is always a demand for inexpensive tracts for general distribution. We have endeavored to supply that demand, and the reader who looks on page 349, this issue, will find a long list of them. See also the list of 10-cent pamphlets on page 30.

An Editor Advises Preachers to Lie.

There are preachers and preachers and editors and editors, and some of the editors induce more of that tired feeling than do some of the preachers. We have previously had occasion to call attention to the orthodoxy and weakness of the editorials of the Atlanta Constitution, but the one now before us easily distances all the others we have seen in the race for first place, so far as these two qualities are concerned. In its issue of May 3d the Constitution says:

"Dr. Newton has stirred up an unnecessary agitation, just as Dr. Lyman Abbott did, a short time ago, when he said in The Outlook that he did not accept literally the New Testament's account of the birth of Christ. What good do these two divines expect to accomplish by reviving these old questions? Why is it that so many preachers seem to be hunting up some passage in the Bible to modify and explain away?"

Has it not occurred to this writer that the preachers named may be desirous of getting at the facts in regard to the life of Jesus and his alleged resurrection? Is it impossible for him to conceive of a Christian searching honestly for the truth? Perhaps Dr. Newton and Dr. Abbott believe that it is better to look with open eyes on even an unwelcome truth than to shut their eyes and accept unquestioningly every assertion that comes to them proclaiming its great age and sanctity. The fact is, the Constitution is chronically and hopelessly ill with religion, and it is in mortal fear lest some one find a remedy that will rid it of the disease. It enjoys being miserable. It believes in taking big and frequent doses of theological drugs and hence it hates to have the spiritual physicians of its own "regular" school suggest that possibly there is not nearly so much virtue in some of the decoctions as has been claimed. It is apprehensive that these admissions of the "regulars" will be seized upon by Dr. Ingersoll, Dr. Putnam, and other physicians of the hygienic and other new schools and be used by them to support their contention that what humanity needs is to quit dosing itself with religious poisons and get back to Mother Nature's simple and healthful regimen. Does it not say this in so many words here?

"Dr. Newton and Dr. Abbott may mean well, but they are playing into the hands of the Infidels, Agnostics, and doubters. Their repudiation of any of the accepted beliefs of the Christian world will be hailed with delight by the followers of Ingersoll and by all who feel disposed to sneer and jest at the solemn creeds of the churches and the revealed word of God."

In other words, the thinking preachers must not tell what they think lest they thereby give aid and comfort to the Freethinkers! The "solemn creeds" must be preserved, let hap what may to the truth of history and the verifiable revelations of science. The Atlanta editor in effect says that Christianity is too weak to withstand the free expression of the thought of its educated ministers. There is no doubt that this is true, nor that if all the ministers who acted on the advice of the Constitution before it was given would permit their lips to utter what their brains have cognized, there would be such a revolution in the churches as no world-religion has ever yet experienced. The planetary systems of Protestantism at least would be shattered into meteoric dust, and the sun of Rome would be rent from equator to poles with seismic convulsions. In its frantic fear of such a catastrophe the Constitution loses sight of the social need of good faith, and of the ethical obligation that rests upon every man and woman, when unthreatened by an intolerant church allied to a despotic state, to give the world his or her truest and ripest thought. It forgets, or does not care, that hypocrisy is the meanest and most corrupting and dangerous of vices, and that the man who actively preaches—under any less compulsion than imminent death, torture, or spoliation—that which he believes to be untrue, is the enemy of order, of peace, and of morality. Read the advice which the Constitution gives to Christian ministers who cannot accept the Bible, "as a whole," as the inerrant word of a perfect god:

"In these days of doubt and disbelief we need more old-fashioned faith and less critical scrutiny of details. Preachers are wanted who accept the Bible as a whole and who do not spend their time in hunting up passages of scripture in order to reject or discredit them. When a good man has a thought that will weaken the faith of others in the Bible, let him promptly suppress it, and never give it utterance. The mission of a preacher should be to strengthen faith and not to weaken it. Let Colonel Ingersoll hunt up 'the mistakes of Moses' and the alleged inconsistencies and incredible things in the Bible. That sort of work suits him, but it does not suit the ministers of the gospel. We are not discussing the merits of the questions revived by these two doctors, but we are firmly convinced that they are injuring the cause of religion by bringing these issues to the front in this age of cranky unbelief. The man who knocks out a single prop that supports the Christian faith is giving aid and comfort to the enemies of religion everywhere."

Are the doctrines of the church upon which Dr. Abbott and Dr. Newton have thrown the light of their rational doubts merely "props" of the Christian faith? Are they not rather two of the foundation stones of the edifice? What becomes of the Christian structure when the God-man disappears? If Jesus was born as other men are, if he was not raised from the grave, the Christian temple tumbles in irretrievable ruin. When the Constitution admits, as it does inferentially but none the less unmistakably, though undoubtedly without thinking, that the "alleged inconsistencies and incredible things in the Bible" are really props of the Christian faith, which the two eminent clergymen named are knocking out, it confesses that the word "alleged" was used without warrant, for if the props are not rotten Messrs. Newton and Abbott can not demolish them, however hard they may try to accomplish that result. This amounts to an admission that the "inconsistencies and incredible things" are actually to be found in the Bible, and that these inconsistent and incredible assertions are and always have been props of the Christian religion. That it should thus be established that the Constitution used the word "alleged" with intent to deceive should not in the least surprise us, for it is both natural and logical that the editor who advises Christian ministers to suppress their real thoughts and preach that which they do not believe should do the same things himself. It need not be wondered at if he follows the tortuous pathway in which he asks the ministers to walk. If the mission of a minister is to strengthen faith in a church and to suppress the truth, or swear that the truth is a lie, when the truth happens to be in conflict with the dogmas that faith is asked to accept, we may reasonably infer that the mission of a party editor is to strengthen faith in his party and to suppress the truth, or swear that the truth is a lie, if it happens to be in conflict with party interests. Are we to conclude that the Constitution is as unreliable in its political, economic, and financial propaganda as it is in its religious apologetics? If the people do so conclude the Georgia editor has no one but himself to blame for the low estimate placed on his veracity.

Look out for more Christian legislation. A movement has been started in this city for the federation "of all the churches of the several denominations in the solution of the religious, social, and other problems which each separate parish or denomination is striving to solve for itself."

Tyrannies Accomplished or Contemplated.

Those people of liberal views who think that there is no particular danger in the Sunday law crusade of the present day sometimes argue that it is the increased disregard of the Sabbath that has led to the demand for and enactment of more sweeping and stringent Sunday laws. The new laws and the bills which have not yet become laws are therefore, they reason, hope-inspiring indications, for they show that the Sabbatarians are confronted with a much greater active and passive opposition than they have ever before encountered, and are therefore under the necessity of resorting to extreme measures to preserve the "sanctity" of the Sabbath. The new secular uses to which Sunday is put call for laws to suppress a growing evil, as the advocates of the law regard this rational use of the first day of the week. In other words, the church is really on the defensive and the secularists are the ones who are pushing the fighting. There is just enough truth in this view to make it dangerous as a moral soporific. It is admitted that many things are now done on Sunday that were not thought of as possible to be done on that day not so very long ago, but it should not be forgotten that conditions have greatly changed within fifty years and that as a consequence the observance of the Sabbath that was possible then is not possible now without incalculable hardship to vast multitudes of the people. Measured by the increase of the opportunity and necessity for Sunday work and recreation there has not been that increase in the rational use of Sunday that is demanded by every consideration of health, comfort, and enjoyment. For instance: Our centers of population are becoming each year more congested and the need for Sunday outings and amusements is growing more and more imperative. Millions of our people live in flats and apartment houses and their children are forced to stay in stuffy, ill-ventilated rooms a great portion of the time when they should be out in the fields in the pure air and vivifying sunshine. Our urban population is increasing; our rural population is diminishing, relatively. By the rapid building up of the city suburbs the country is getting farther and farther away from the thickly populated sections of the cities, the sections where dwell the poorer classes, those who have the least time for recreation on the work days of the week, and who have no private conveyances by which they could escape to the fields and forests on Sunday, as the wealthy can, Sunday laws or no Sunday laws. But, on the other hand, science and business enterprise have provided means of transit whereby the masses of the poor can have a good outing on Sunday at a very small cost. Steam and electricity have solved the problem of rapid and cheap transit. For a few cents the steam, electric, and cable roads take the people to the outlying parks, to the seashore, to their friends in the country. Multitudes are thus enabled to disregard the old Puritan traditions, yet, after all, common sense use of Sunday has not kept pace with the necessities of the situation and with the advance in intelligence in other directions. But against all the progress that has been made the Sunday worshipers have set their faces like flint, vehemently demanding that not only shall we not be permitted to march parallel with the head of the columns of development, but that we shall reverse our movement and double-quick to the rear. All parts of the country are to be put under the laws which have hitherto been accepted by only the inert majorities of the least modern states and cities. National Sunday laws are to be enacted which shall stop the Sunday mails and all inter-state business, although the mails have been running on the first day of the week for at least a century, and the fight against this "desecration" has raged for nearly as long. So that the present crusade against Sunday mails cannot truly be said to be provoked by a new violation of Sunday sacredness and therefore to be regarded as an indication of augmenting liberty of thought and action.

Neither have the Adventists sprung any new defiance of the Sunday law; they have always insisted that Saturday is the Sabbath, and that the Biblical command is as imperative for the employment of the other six days in work. It is a matter of conscience with them to rest on Saturday and work on Sunday, so that the present unexampled persecution of these people is not due to any change of attitude, theoretical or practical, on their part. The fact is, the church party is better organized than ever before in this country. There is a union for practical purposes that is unprecedented among Protestants. Doctrine has no longer the first place in the minds of these Christians. Many of the theocratic leaders frankly admit that the continued existence of Christianity depends upon the preservation of Sunday as a sacred day, and this is impossible without the assistance of the law. The numerous societies that are doing the political work of the church are rapidly augmenting their membership and perfecting their systems of organization. In most of them denominational lines are wholly obliterated and the young and others easily deluded by illusive catch-words enthusiastically take up the work laid out by the reactionary leaders. The churches themselves are becoming more and more social clubs where fashionable women meet to show their new gowns and get them described by the society reporter, and the young men—a few of them—go to meet the young women, but the church as a club can get more assistance in its treasonable work from those who do not believe in its doctrines than it could were it to stick to its dogmatic propaganda, while its auxiliary organizations are engaged in vigorously pushing the practical work on the platform, through the press, and in the halls of legislation. Some very easily satisfied people seem to be perfectly willing that the authoritarian church shall have its way so long as it does not openly demand the right to prescribe by law that they shall believe in the Athanasian Creed or the Thirty-nine Articles. They will submit to Sunday statutes, the Bible in the schools, the muzzling of the press and the mails, a censorship of amusements, and any amount of other meddling supervision so long as it is demanded in the name of "rest," or "purity," or "morality." They appear to be incapable of discriminating between the name and the reality. The scheming priest has to wear but the thinnest of disguises to deceive them. Strange, is it not, that they have read the records of the world with so little understanding that they do not know that the ecclesiastic never abandons his purpose to rule mankind; that he is possessed by the one ambition to dominate, to force his beliefs regarding the gods and the destiny of the "soul" of man upon the inhabitants of the whole earth? He is a lightning change artist, and if he cannot win in his proper form as priest he will don a mask and appear as moralist, health reformer, champion of labor, or scientific faddist. But through it all and under all guises he believes in the sovereign virtue of the principle of injected righteousness, of law-compelled belief, health, rest, and virtue.

With the Protestant, Puritan Sabbatarians are now joined the disciplined legions of the Catholic church. The Pope has officially indorsed the Sunday observance movement in France, and in this country the Roman church is rapidly assuming the leadership in the same crusade. The inference is direct and indisputable that the command has been given to help the Protestants secure the more general and rigorous enforcement of the observance of the Sabbath established by the Catholic church. It remains to be seen whether the various "patriotic" orders, which exist, it is asserted, to resist the encroachments of this church and to secure the absolute divorcement of the religious and political institutions of the country, but which have never lisped a word in condemnation of the Protestant theocratic movement, including the attacks upon Sunday liberty, will place themselves on the right side now that Rome has joined hands with Geneva.

To those who argue that there is no danger, that the battle for the Free Sunday is won, and that the shots that are now heard all over the country ring out only from the skirmish lines of the retreating rear guards of the enemy, it is sufficient to say that they are not well-informed concerning contemporary events—that each passing year witnesses the enactment of new and more severe Sunday laws, and the enforcement of provisions long slumbering in the codes. For several years now the supreme courts of the states have been deciding uniformly for the constitutionality of Sunday laws. Missouri, Nebraska, Michigan, and other states have thus fallen into line. In California Sunday has always been the play-day of the people, and if we now find her gradually but surely coming under the sway of the Sabbatarian, we cannot plead that the new repressive statutes and ordinances are created to deal with new offenses against the sanctity of Sunday; and so again we are debarred from claiming that they are really evidences of progress instead of retrogression. No, the average general tendency is backward. In all portions of the trans-Mississippi country north of Missouri Sunday laws were practically a nullity in the early days. But as population increased and the preachers found money to build churches the ecclesiastical organizations grew in influence, a change for the worse set in, and today the cords of Sunday legislation are tightening about the limbs of the citizen in every Central and Western state and territory. Here in New York we had practically a free Sunday twenty years ago. A little later than that began the present closing propaganda, and, while progress has been made in some directions, the friends of freedom have lost far more than they have gained. The Sunday battle is on Now.

All branches of the orthodox Christian church apparently agree with the Covenanters that a law-enforced Sabbath is the last defense of Christianity. They are all eagerly reaching for this sword of temporal power, and the ease with which they are grasping it in most instances indicates that the progressive people of the world do not realize the truth of the old adage that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. Keep the enemy out of your forts or you will have to take him out after he has securely intrenched himself in the strongholds which you weakly and needlessly surrendered at the first assault. The fight against Sunday slavery is on Now.

The Christian Advocate condemns those ministers who speak in a doubtful tone concerning the observance of the Sabbath. It says that it is the duty of the minister to give to the important problems which confront him his careful and earnest thought, and if after doing so he does not know which side he is on he should keep still until he does know. This is very good advice, and for others besides ministers. But the necessary implication is that if, after investigation, he does know which side he is on, the clergyman should tell which it is and give the reasons for his conclusion. This would be rank heresy in the sight of the Atlanta Constitution, which holds that the minister should give no consideration to any problems involving doubt of the absolute truth of the doctrines of Christianity, but if peradventure he has such doubts it is his duty to keep them to himself. In this particular instance the editor of the religious journal would seem to be a long distance in advance of the editor of the political newspaper, but if we should read to the end of Rev. Mr. Buckley's editorial we should find him insisting that the minister must proclaim the will of God, not his own views, and that the record of God's will is certainly to be found in the Bible, which is tantamount to the assertion that the minister is bound to believe the Bible, no matter what his investigations may have led him to conclude concerning its claims to inspiration and authenticity. Thus we in the outcome find that the Christian Advocate and the Constitution stand on the same platform of mental stultification and moral disingenuousness.

Evidently some Georgia Christians are a little ashamed of the Sunday law of that state, especially when they consider it in connection with their infamous chain-gang system of punishment. We spoke recently of the arrest of J. Q. Allison, a Seventh-Day Adventist, for plowing in his field on Sunday. On May 15th he was found guilty, but the judge assessed against him only the costs, $22, with the alternative of twelve months in the chain-gang if the costs were not paid. As it was soon perceived that Mr. Allison would not pay the fine, his Christian neighbors of the Sunday-enforcement school urgently entreated him to do so and not disgrace his family by going to the chain-gang. He thanked them for their intended kindness, but said that there was a principle involved which he could not sacrifice. Then the sheriff started with him and other prisoners for Atlanta to sell them to the gang contractors, but when the train arrived at Austell, where the Sabbath-keeper lived, the sheriff ordered him to go home, but not to work any more on Sunday. If he should, he was told, he would get the full penalty of the law the next time. It was ascertained subsequently that some unknown persons had paid the costs. This demonstrates anew the fact that individual Christians are sometimes better than their creeds and the laws they get enacted to uphold their creeds. But this payment of fines and costs by outside parties does not dispose of the issue raised by the Sunday statutes, and Mr. Allison is in as great danger as he was before if he dares to live his own life in his own way.

The New York Tribune thinks that the Roman church will be likely to regard the cataract in the eye of Premier Crispi of Italy as "a providential chastisement of the evil he has wrought upon it with so relentless and unsparing a hand." The Tribune adds that "that is one way of accounting for his misfortune, and is quite professional from a priestly point of view," but it conjectures that the trouble has been caused by the overwork of his eyes, as well as of his other faculties, and concludes that he "ought to have a good deal of useful work in him yet, and Italy is by no means beyond her need of him, whatever the church may think about it." From which it would appear that Mr. Reid's paper does not circulate very extensively among Leo's children. In another paragraph the same journal speaks of the little breeze occasioned in the church by the indiscretion of Cardinal Hohenlohe, who, at a ministerial banquet, toasted Crispi, "the enemy of the church and current peninsular representative in the priestly imagination of antichrist." So a "serious pontifical wiggling has been prepared for him." However, the princely cardinal was not so submissive as a dutiful son of the church should be, and declined to receive the said wiggling, whereupon "Hierarch and Hierophant parted from the interview in anger," while ominous mutterings of coming convulsion in the very vitals of the church were heard, saying nothing of external complications. The Tribune does not apprehend that the incident will have any serious permanent consequences, but thinks "it possesses an interest of its own, inspiring the faithful with a conviction that something particular ought to happen to the priest or layman who takes upon himself the responsibility of a personal altercation with the Pope." Even should the incident produce a grave breach in the relations of the Pope and the cardinal it will be nothing novel in the history of the church, for such quarrels have been many and sanguinary in the past. It is quite probable, however, that the church could not stand internal dissensions so well now as it did in an age of more childlike faith and less knowledge.

"The number of parsons who become demented by a too unrestrained perusal of the Old Testament and set out to re-enact the rite of human sacrifice is not great, but the succession of them is never long interrupted, the last one, the Rev. Sidney Linscott, appearing at West Brownfield, in Maine, animated with the pious desire of offering up one of his youthful sons and seeking in prayer some indication of the most acceptable mode in which the offering should be made. This unhappy apostle has been placed under careful guard, and there is no chance of his being allowed to carry out his maniacal design, as one of his predecessors in another New England town actually did a few years ago under a similar inspiration of religious frenzy. There is no moral to be drawn from such occurrences. They will take place about so often, and the story of Abraham on Mount Moriah will be too much for the wits of a certain limited average of parsons everywhere and in all periods."—New York Tribune.

"Too much for the wits of a certain limited average of parsons"? And of editors, too, it would appear. Suppose that the "Age of Reason" had from the day of its publication to this led "a succession," "never long interrupted," of "a certain limited average of parsons," or of other persons, to "set out to re-enact the rite of human sacrifice," would the Tribune have been able to find "no moral" in the occurrence? The moral is as large and insistently prominent as the dome of the state house at Boston. So long as people believe that the Bible is the revelation of the will of a perfect God, and they read therein that Abraham earned the title of "Father of the Faithful" because he was willing and ready to sacrifice his beloved son on the altar of that God, so long there will be a certain number of believers, in all stations in life, who will attempt to imitate him. That vent for dementia is directly traceable to the biblical legend of Abraham and Isaac. The more devout and sincere the believer the more likely he is to kill somebody in his desperate effort to make his peace with the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. It is only people whose common sense is stronger than their faith, and whose love for their children is greater than their love of God, and more powerful than their fear of hell, to whom "the story of Abraham on Mount Moriah" is not "too much for their wits." And that is the moral that the Tribune cannot see. Where is it looking? Here is another of that "never long interrupted" succession of Christians who really believe that the Bible God meant what he is reported to have said:

"SPOKANE, WASH., May 11.—Newton Blagg, a rancher residing near Chatteroy, came home yesterday just in time to save his two-year-old child from a horrible death. His insane wife had built an altar in the woods upon which she had secured the child preparatory to roasting it alive. She was engaged in offering up a prayer for her sacrifice when her husband arrived. He brought his wife here for commitment to the insane asylum."

Is there no "moral" in the fact that people who sacrifice, or prepare to sacrifice, their children refer to the contemplated sacrifice of Isaac by Abraham, and pray to his God, if to any, as they almost invariably do?

"The minister should proclaim the will of God, not his own views. He is a man with a message, not a problem. The message is found in the word of God. It is not something which the preacher discovers by investigating the tendency of movements and the trend of modern thought. Current events cannot settle great moral principles. They may help to interpret and illustrate truth, but the truth is found in the Bible. The laws of God are applicable to all conditions of men, binding on all communities, and suited to all ages. When God has spoken there is nothing for the minister to do but teach what God has said and insist on implicit obedience."—Christian Advocate.

"The will of God" which the minister proclaims is inevitably his personal view of what that will is, or the view of his church blindly accepted by him. The human equation cannot be eliminated. To every minister the gospel he preaches is a problem, if he can think; if he cannot, it is still a problem, and he simply echoes the terms in which it was formulated by his predecessors who did think, however erroneously. The message he delivers was found in the Bible, as interpreted by himself or others, but that fact still leaves open the question as to the authorship and authenticity of that work. On every page and in every doctrine the minister touches the work of human hands and brains. He may guess that at first the book was made by God, but between him and the revealer, if there was a revealer, there stretches the, for him, interminable line of copyists, editors, interpolators, translators, proof-readers, printers, binders, and the rest. He never gets back to the divine first hand, even if there was a divine first hand. While it is true that "current events cannot settle great moral principles" authoritatively, it is still more true that the Bible cannot settle them. This is proven by the circumstance that while the Bible is claimed to be the revelation of the only possible divine code of morals, the Christian world, so-called, is divided hopelessly on this very issue, and the related one concerning what the Bible does teach regarding moral conduct. Not only have God and his self-selected ambassadors been unable to silence doubts respecting the alleged supernatural origin of the book, but they have been equally unsuccessful in their endeavors to reach an agreement as to what it actually teaches. There is some truth in the Bible, but not all truth, and there is much falsity. Neither does it contain THE truth, for there is no such thing. Truth is not an entity. Truth is accurate description, that is all. We do not know that "the laws of God are applicable to all conditions of men, binding on all communities and suited to all ages." We do not know that there are laws of God, we do not know that there is a God, and we do not know what are the conditions that environ all men and govern the life of all communities, hence we are not qualified to affirm that any particular code of morals is adapted to all men in all societies and of all ages. Theology is wastefully prodigal in utterly unverifiable assumptions. We are well aware that the minister insists that he is the mouthpiece of God, and that the ordinary mortal has nothing to do but render "implicit obedience"—not to God, who is always behind the curtain, but to the minister who speaks, and would rule, in his name. So long as the minister persists in regarding himself as the god-appointed master of the universe men who value liberty must hold him to be the enemy of the race and treat him accordingly.

Of a Business Nature.

The "Field-Ingersoll Discussion," so long out of print, is again in the hands of the printer, and all our readers will be pleased to know that in a short time it will be ready for them in the same handsome style in which Mr. Farrell gets out all of his books, and reduced in price to 25 cents. We are ready for orders.

It will please Mr. Putnam's friends—and what Liberal cannot be thus described?—to know that the first edition, of fifteen hundred copies, of his "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" has been sold, and that the second edition is now off the press and in the binder's possession. Those who have ordered one and not received it may look for it within a few days. To this edition we have added the portraits of Thomas Jefferson and Benjamin Franklin, and of J. Hacker, one of the Freethought veterans now with us. We hope to get many fresh orders for this all-comprehensive and important history of Freethought and Freethinkers. It has met with the greatest favor on all sides, and is worthy of it. Price the same: $5, or with THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, $6 50—a saving of a dollar and a half. Send for it when you renew your subscription.

Attention is called to the list of Tracts advertised in another place, as well as to the list of cheap pamphlets which we advise folks interested in spreading Liberalism to read and give to their friends. The tracts range in price from 1 cent to 10 cents. The cheap pamphlets in the list are 10 cents each, or twelve for a dollar.

The Special New Subscriber Offer is still open, and we hope a few hundred more of our readers will call the attention of their Liberal friends to it. See Special New Subscriber Offer on first page of this issue.

As a missionary scheme the offer of eight copies of the "Age of Reason," by Thomas Paine, to as many different addresses for one dollar is a success. We have had calls for several thousands of them and have scattered them from Maine to Alaska. Quite a number also appreciate the companion offer of twelve copies of "Self-Contradictions of the Bible" to as many different addresses for one dollar, and we hope to have to print a new edition of that book soon to supply the demand. Both of these books are calculated to make the ministers sorry and to open the eyes of their dupes. The "Age of Reason" has done a wonderful work; it has drawn thousands from superstition to reason, and will draw thousands more if they will but read it. The "Self-Contradictions" is a puzzler to the orthodox, and a starter to those Christians who will let their reason have half a chance along with the Bible fetish.

It is an unpleasant thing to do, but it appears to be necessary to once more jog the memories of those of our friends who owe for their TRUTH SEEKER. As we have been remarking for the past few weeks, there are a good many of these on the list, and the natural consequence is that we are short of money, for we depend on these subscriptions being paid with reasonable promptness to pay our own bills. When they are not forthcoming our creditors mourn. Three dollars—or a part thereof—is not an awful large sum in this big country, and it is probably easy for most of our friends to send it the first time they think of it. And it is to make them think of it that we print these few lines.

The third volume of Moncure D. Conway's edition of the collected works of Thomas Paine is now on sale. Price, $2.50.

News and Notes.

The voyage along the English channel is simply indescribable in its beauty and splendor. The morning was effulgent, and sea and shore were glittering in ever-changing luster. The passengers crowded the deck, watching the glowing panorama as the great ship plowed the waters. The landscapes appeared in infinit variety; the white cliffs, sandy beaches, broad fields, wooded eminences, beautiful homes, vast structures, forts, hospitals, and castles, and dawning on the vision the huge and busy wharfs. We gaze upon the Isle of Wight bathed in the glory of the sunlight—a garden shining to the very edge of the sea, constantly unfolding into new prospects of soft and splendid color.

With banners floating the City of Berlin neared its goal from across the waters, with its wondrous freight of human hopes and joys. Intently I watched the surging multitude along the wharf to discover the stalwart Watts, for without his genial face I should be a pilgrim and a stranger indeed. He was on hand, and by his side George W. Foote, and we waved a greeting from deck and shore. After some tedious preliminaries of landing, unloading, and examining baggage, etc., we finally made out to shake hands in true English and Yankee fashion. We were soon in the railroad coach, which seemed small compared to our ponderous American cars, but it was elegant and comfortable, and we had a compartment all to ourselves, which was certainly advantageous, for we could talk to our hearts' content, as if at our own firesides. It didn't take long to become acquainted with our noble comrade, George W. Foote, who is as open as the day and greets you with the frankness and politeness of a man of the world. The journey of ninety miles to London was a delightful one. A fresh May day it was. The golden buttercups mingled with the green grass in wide fields. The trees were in blossom. The farmer was plowing, and villages and cities gleamed upon the view. Soon we were in the heart of London, and I was as hungry as a bear, for it was about 3 P.M., and I had not eaten since the morning on board. There is nothing like a good square meal to spice the journey and to keep your footing on this solid earth, for really I was in such a sort of ecstatic, dreamy state of mind that I felt I could almost be disembodied and not know it. I was in London; just think of it. London! the marvelous city of the world, where you are "in the swim" of the wonder and joy of the universe. In London, without doubt, the red heart of humanity sweeps its swiftest, grandest tides. Well, we had a long and joyous dinner. It was an intellectual repast along with delightful material things. Foote is an excellent caterer. He is not a dreamy philosopher. With his intellectual vitality he has a keen comprehension of the reality of life, and is a wise and witty cosmopolitan.

After dinner Watts takes me to his own home on Effra road, Brixton. Through what a bewildering maze we pass as the great omnibus rolls along. Over the Thames, with its crowded bosom sparkling beneath you; by the great parks and hundreds of gardens, miles and miles we go, and yet the multitude does not seem to diminish. The streets are full, the shops are shining with all manner of goods, and business is evidently driving. However, Effra road, which stretches from the Brixton thoroughfare, is almost as quiet as a country lane. It is simply beautiful in the bloom of May, grass and flowers in front of every dwelling, and here and there almost a forest of trees. In this lovely and entrancing scenery glows the fireside of our Freethought friend, Charles Watts, known in both worlds for his able and brilliant labors. What a hospitable welcome I had! Mrs. Charles Watts will never be forgotten by her many American friends, for she, too, with woman's genius, has been a standard-bearer in the pioneer ranks, and added her eloquence to the inspirations of our cause. And then there are the mother and sister, and the daughter, Miss Katie, and certainly in all England there is not a more radiant home circle than this. Nor must I forget the "two dogs," Queenie and Bell, worthy of the song of Burns for their vivacity and good-will. What a joyous evening I had on Effra road, where the murmur of mighty London is scarcely heard, though the great city heaves and tosses and thunders only a block away. I could scarcely realize that Watts and I, who had battled together on the frontier of the New World, were now again together in the heart of old England thousands of miles from the scenes of our former companionship.

The next day, Saturday, I was busy writing a multitude of letters, and getting off my News and Notes for THE TRUTH SEEKER, until noon. Then the hansom cab is ordered and Watts and I take a long drive to Euston station, where he is to take the cars for Glasgow. For a week he is to lecture and debate in Scotland. We meet Mr. Foote at the station and bid good-bye to Watts at 2 P.M., and then Mr. Foote takes me to his own home for dinner. In going thither I catch a glimpse of the walls and towers of Holloway prison, where for twelve months Mr. Foote was incarcerated—the martyr of liberty—maintaining with unflinching courage the rights of a free press. He also has a charming residence—grass and flowers in front, and quite a long garden in the rear, where the children can play to their heart's content. There are four pretty children, bright as jewels, and sparkling with health and happiness. What gracious hospitality in this Freethought home! Mrs. Foote is entirely congenial with her husband, a noble companion in his toils and sacrifices. After dinner we go aloft to the top story, where is the study and splendid library of my host. What an array of books he has worth their weight in gold! What stores of wisdom out of which are forged the thunderbolts of Freethought, and the "acid drops" and "sugar plums" that burn and sparkle in the pages of the Freethinker. What a memory and a promise in these hoarded treasures, the new ever flashing from the old at the magic touch of genius.

After a smoke and wide intellectual discursiveness among books, we take a trip to the Zoological Gardens. This is a very interesting place. We pass through beautiful scenery and we witness all sorts of curious and wonderful things, dim suggestions of man himself in a vast variety of animal life. Snakes and monkeys are especially interesting. I hate snakes, but I can't help looking at them in their hideous fascination. As to the monkeys, I must admit the distant relationship. They seem to possess lots of human nature, in their affections, in their quarrels, in their gambols, and at times solemn earnestness of expression, as if they were trying to study out what kind of impertinent animals we might be. I did enjoy the "Zoo." I felt at though I were looking into the very depths of our ancestral life.

From the "Zoo" we walked through Regent's Park, a magnificent park, vast in extent, with great sweeps of green and masses of forest. At times the city is lost in the stretches of foliage, and you can easily imagine that you are with shepherds and their flocks in some Arcadia far away from the "madding crowd."

From Regent's Park, on top of the tremendous omnibus, looking over all creation, as if from a moving tower, we thunder and rattle to our destination, and Saturday night spreads its moonlight splendors over the scene, and dreamland follows anon.

Sunday morning comes, at first with sunshine, and then with clouds, but finally the sunshine prevails, and the afternoon is gorgeous. We take a walk in Brookwood Park, and visit the old English garden, and wander without restriction over the green grass. This park contains several hundred acres, and was recently given to the city by its owner, who earned his fortune in the slave-trade, and of course he only did the right thing to convey it for the benefit of humanity. But that will never atone for the blood and tears of suffering thousands.

Sunday evening sparkled along, and with it one of the great occasions of my life. For the first time I was to address an audience of English Freethinkers. I trembled in anticipation of it—it meant so much. England and America were to shake hands, and I hoped there might be nothing to mar the glory of the union. And there was nothing. When I reached the Hall of Science there was a great crowd in front; and by half-past seven o'clock every seat was occupied, and people were standing. I guess there were about 1,400 present, for that is, I understand, the capacity of the hall. I like an English audience. They know how to cheer. They do it with a vim, a cordiality, a thunderousness which is truly enlivening. A man who can't talk after such a cheer as they give must be somewhat like a man who has no music in his soul. It is like martial music, this glorious welcome—when we enter the hall—when President Foote arises to address the people—when the representative of American Freethought is introduced—when the names of Bradlaugh, Foote, and Watts are mentioned—when the brief and cheery message of Ingersoll is read—when the magic words, Thomas Paine, are uttered, and when finally the speaker closes. It was, I must say, a magnificent occasion and a grand success, and with all my heart I thank Foote and Watts and other English friends for their generous, beautiful, inspiring welcome. The thrill of comradeship from England to America is indeed jubilant and far reaching, and will make the labors of the future more glorious throughout the world.

I like George W. Foote. He is a born leader.

He has a penetrating and independent judgment. He has clear insight. He understands the situation. He comprehends Freethought. There are no clouds or mists in his intellectual horizon. He has breadth as well as concentration and energy. He is an all-round man, level-headed, brave, determined, uncompromising, yet intellectually charitable; far-seeing, for he beholds in the principle the inevitable result; and therefore he is never swung off his balance. He does not fall into side issues. He keeps straight on to the goal. He is the man of the hour, and the movement in England is broadening, and deepening, and strengthening through his wise conduct.

America knows Watts, vigorous and splendid, and still in the prime of his powers. Fortunate it is that we have such men as Watts and Foote to lead forward the great Freethought enterprise in England. They are admirably adapted for co-operation; masterful in their way and winning the confidence, support, and affection of the Freethought army all along the line. Amidst a thousand difficulties and disappointments, this great army is moving on. Robert Forder, Arthur B. Moss, and others, whose names I shall hereafter mention in connection with more full details of this great movement, are enthusiastic and talented co-laborers and standard-bearers, constantly pushing onward the banners of our hope, fearless and advancing at every point of the mighty conflict.

I do believe that Ingersoll would have an audience of 20,000 people the first night he spoke in London. The English people do love and admire him; and no man in the wide world would secure such a welcome as he. Everybody inquires, "When is Ingersoll coming?" It is in the air that America must contribute its noblest flower of genius to the struggling hosts of freedom in other lands.

Monday morning I find the publication office of the Freethinker, and Charles Watts the younger, who, as publisher, is doing a splendid work for Freethought, for culture and advancement, for science and literature. He looks the elder Watts in feature and expression, with the same energy and cordiality, and the charm of youthfulness, which, alas! we old-timers must forever surrender. I was delighted to meet this cultivated and enterprising co-worker.

In the afternoon Samuel Forder took me to Smithville Market, which is, I understand, the greatest market in the world. Underneath it run the metropolitan railways, and thus from the bowels of the earth the market is constantly supplied with all that land and sea produce.

I visited the spot where John Rogers and the other martyrs suffered, to whom a monument is erected, upon which, however, is no inscription, for the Catholics petitioned against it, not wishing to be reminded of the horrors of history. Close by the monument I visited the oldest church now in London; then I went to Guildhall, and roamed amidst its historic relics, libraries, pictures, statues, etc., and then I ventured into the wonderful Cathedral of St. Paul's—a sublime structure, indeed, gloomy, however, as a grave. A choral service was going on as we entered. The music was beautiful, but the prayers between were execrable, and the preaching—well, when it came to that dull stuff we retreated. In such a place as St. Paul's there should be only music. That only can accord with the glory and vastness of its architecture.

So far as I can judge London is the most beautiful city in the world. It is not simply immense, a huge bee-hive, a whirl of business, a rush of millions of people, a rattle and thunder of thousands of vehicles; it is a city of gardens, of flowers and grass and trees, entirely in contrast with Chicago, Boston, New York, or any other city that I know of. No other city can boast of so many and so large parks as London; and besides the parks there are innumerable gardens in front and rear of the houses on almost every street. Every Londoner wants a garden, and he will scarcely rent a house without a garden. There is therefore a charming mingling of country life with this great city. There are many quiet nooks where you are embowered with green foliage and flowers of all hue; and in the busiest streets verdant spaces flash upon the view. Wherever there is a chance to put a tree, there a tree grows. At this season of the year, with the glorious sunshine of May flooding all, the views are simply enchanting. The sweetness and beauty of nature greet you amidst the art and splendor of man's achievement. Along with the thousands of gardens and hundreds of parks and squares, there is the Thames river, with its ever-changing magnificent water views, its bridges, its boats, its ships and barges, the vast and splendid architecture on either side—historic buildings, towers and domes, far as the eye can reach.

I like the great omnibuses. How they roll along crowded with passengers on top. There is where I like to get. It is something of a climb, but you feel quite elated when you sit down twenty feet in air and go bowling along as if you were riding a comet. What sights are presented as you dash through the surges of London life!

The hansom cabs are fine, too—easy and cheap. There are thousands of them, and they glide merrily along like gondolas on a river. No matter in what part of the city you may be, these cabs are always at hand.

They keep the streets clean here. Boys and men are all the time at work with shovels, "dust-pans," etc. If a particle of dirt accumulates it is instantly brushed away. The streets are like a floor.

The rush of traffic is enormous. Oftentimes, at a crossing, a long array of vehicles awaits the passage of another array. The police, by a simple motion of the arm, regulates the passage. There is no talk or dispute. Now one procession moves on, and then the other. You have to take a good look when you cross the street, and then make a dash. Every day in London you would think that nobody was at home, and that everybody was on the go. It is like an everlasting festival day. It beats New Jerusalem all to pieces. Nobody would want to go heaven so long as he could stay in London and see the sights. The angel Gabriel might blow his trumpet and it would not disturb a single soul. They are used to all sorts of noises here. Even the resurrection would not be a very surprising affair in such a cosmopolitan place as London.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"Our American Visitor."

From the London Freethinker.

Mr. S. P. Putnam, the president of the American Secular Union, set foot on the shores of Albion on Friday morning, May 2d. It was the dream of his life to visit this old country; the land of his forefathers, the land of Shakspeare and Shelley, and of Scott and Burns, the land of Thomas Paine and Charles Bradlaugh. He longed to see the Freethinkers of Britain, and to clasp hands with the men he had read of, who were over there—across the wide Atlantic—fighting the great battle of liberty. So one day he made up his mind to go, and now he is here in wonderland. It is not the vastness of our country that rouses his enthusiasm; for our island is ridiculously small to Americans, who say that we have to be careful after dark lest we should fall off into the water. The only big thing here is London, and that is big; colossal, stupendous, overpowering. No, it is the great historic memories that appeal to a man like Mr. Putnam; not only what is, but what has been; the long past of a great present, and (let us hope) a mightier future.

When I heard that Mr. Putnam was coming I resolved that he should have a hearty welcome. Mr. Watts told me that he was a genial, earnest, hard-working "Liberal"—as they call Freethinkers in America; I knew myself that he was an able writer, and, beyond all that, he was the elected chief officer of the American Secularists. Apart, therefore, from any promptings of my own heart, I was bound to hold out the right hand of good fellowship.

Mr. Putnam came over on the "City of Berlin." She was due at Southampton some time on Friday morning; and as she might be in early in such fine weather, and we did not like the thought of his waiting on board the ship, with no one to greet him as she touched the shore, Mr. Watts and I ran down from London on the Thursday evening, so as to be in readiness at the moment of her arrival. It was lovely weather when we walked down to the dock, and we rejoiced that our American visitor would have a good introduction to our climate. When the "Berlin" arrived we were soon on board, and I welcomed Mr. Putnam in the name of the Secularists of this country.

There is nothing of the legendary Yankee—long, thin, and taciturn—about Mr. Putnam. Were it not for his mustach, he might be taken for a jolly little Irish priest. He positively bubbles over with geniality. Of course he does a little "guessing," but his American accent is not aggressiv. It is just enough to give spice to his speech in the ears of an Englishman.

Yankees are somehow thought to be boastful. Why, I could never understand. Perhaps I have met with picked specimens, but I have always found them at least as modest as Englishmen. I remember the late Dr. Garrison, of Chicago, and how fine, manly, and unassuming he was. And there is really not the slightest flavor of "uppishness" about Mr. Putnam. He is sincere, open, and unaffected; and I was thoroughly at home with him in a few minutes.

We were a merry trio as we sped along to London by the boat train. We chatted about English and American Freethought, and I was surprised to see how well Mr. Putnam was posted up in the history of our movement on this side of the Atlantic. Every now and then, as he caught sight of an idyllic landscape in the Lotos-land we were passing through, he exclaimed, "That's fine!" America was younger and more unkempt; here the hand of man had been at work for ever so many centuries, giving the land an air of orderliness and good breeding.

The Hall of Science was crowded on Sunday evening, when Mr. Putnam stood for the first time on an English platform, and heard for the first time in his life a ringing English cheer. Several ladies were upon the platform, including Mrs. Foote and Mrs. Watts. Among the more ungainly sex I noted Messrs. Wheeler, Forder, Parris, Moss, Samson, and Roger. Miss Vance and Miss Brown were busy and, alas! perspiring over their work in the hall. I had given up my own Sunday to do our visitor honor, and through him the whole Secular party in America. My words as chairman were few. Mr. Putnam's rising was the signal for an outburst of enthusiasm that fairly startled him, and for a few minutes he was a little nervous. But he soon warmed to his work, and carried the audience with him to the end of his lecture. Mr. Putnam's style is what the Americans most appreciate—easy, colloquial, and abounding in anecdotes, which are always telling and illuminative. His spring chicken story fairly convulsed the house. Of course it was at the expense of a minister. Mr. Engstrom, one of the secretaries of the Christian Evidence Society, who was busy taking notes, could hardly have relished this sally.

Mr. Putnam resumed his seat amidst a tempest of applause. One gentleman asked a question and offered a little opposition, which was well answered. Then an irrepressible lady took an innings. What she said was mostly unintelligible. But two points were clear enough. First, she said she was not religious; afterwards, she said she was a Catholic. This was too rich for anything. The audience exploded, and lecturer and chairman joined in the merriment.

Colonel Ingersoll had sent Mr. Putnam a brief letter before the latter left America. It was short and sharp—a kind of telegram from the front—for the Colonel is on a very active lecturing tour, with little time for correspondence. Mr. Putnam read this letter, and it immensely delighted the audience. He will read a longer letter from Colonel Ingersoll at the National Secular Society's conference.

Mr. Putnam was delighted with his reception, which, he says, far exceeded all his anticipations; and no doubt he has sent a glowing report to the New York TRUTH SEEKER, for which he is to write descriptive articles during his stay in England.

Mr. Putnam will be made as happy as possible while he is in London. When he goes into the provinces I have no doubt he will meet with similar treatment. It should be a point of honor to give him large meetings as well as a hearty welcome. Mr. Putnam is a soldier of Freethought. His life is dedicated to her service. He subsists on soldier's wages—when there are any. We must see that he goes back to America with good reason to say that British Freethinkers are cordial, brotherly, and generous. And we want him to say all this, and as much more as his heart may prompt, to Colonel Ingersoll. We want him to tell the Colonel that the Freethinkers of this country are dying to see him, and that if he will only come he may be sure of a grand and loving reception. G. W. FOOTE.

Lecture Notes.

After one month's retirement I am again in the field, making Holstein, Ia., the scene of my first operations. I begin in the midst of an unparalleled change in the weather. On May 10 the thermometer fell about fifty degrees in less than ten hours, and instead of summer's heat we soon had nipping frost, which has done great damage to fruit. I found Holstein full of Liberals. The Turn Verein has a large hall, where I gave my lecture. Every Sunday the Turners have gymnastic exercises or a dance, and the orthodox are powerless to prevent it. Mr. C. H. Schneekloth made the arrangements. This gentleman and his father and Charles Zeaman are our leaders in Holstein. A good audience greeted me, and the editor of the Ida County Herald, a German paper, has promised to translate and publish my lecture in the German language. Really, it is refreshing to find a town and a press that the priesthood cannot control.

On Saturday morning I take the first freight for Correctionville, where I again meet my friend A. H. Petty, who has probably made more Infidels than any other man in northwestern Iowa. His hotel office is supplied with TRUTH SEEKERS and books.

If he specially admires one of Heston's cartoons, he frames it and puts it in a conspicuous place, where "the faithful" can see it. His family are in full sympathy with Liberalism, and more than one Christian has been forever turned from "the religion of his fathers" when he remained long in the atmosphere of Petty's hotel. I did not lecture in Correctionville, but reserved my strength for two lectures in Pierson on Sunday, May 12. Quite a party went up from Correctionville, consisting of Mr. and Mrs. Petty, Mr. and Mrs. Molyneaux, Mr. and Mrs. Morrow, Mr. Otto Kind, and Mr. Smith. The last-named gentleman is a late recruit. When I was in this part of the country two years ago he was a Christian and a trustee of the Congregational church. Our Pierson friends are so well known by their devotion to our cause that I need say but little of them. Mr. S. F. Benson, Dr. Effner, Mr. Brooks, Mr. Hoffman, and a hall filled with an intelligent and enthusiastic audience, prove that there is no lack of interest. The church, by its Falstaff tactics a year ago regarding the proposed Jamieson-Dungan debate, has done itself great harm and revealed its true character. After withdrawing publicly from the contest, these "champions of public morality," these "people of God," had the audacity to make the totally false accusation that "the Infidels backed out." Their attempt was a failure, and now the scorn of all honest men rests upon their heads.

It is a long distance from Pierson to Crookston, Minn., my next appointment, and between riding and waiting I was one day and two nights making the journey. Twelve hours of the time was spent in the great twin cities of the West, Minneapolis and St. Paul. A vast improvement is to be added to the many natural facilities of these places. A monster dam is to be built across the Mississippi below St. Anthony's Falls, costing $750,000, employing a thousand men, and requiring two years for completion. It will be used to make power for the monster flouring mills of the two places. I arrived in Crookston very early in the morning and was first greeted on the street by my friend William Munch, who is a Liberal in act as well as in word. Next I found Andrew Steenerson, who was elected sheriff last fall. Soon I saw his brother, Elias, who has interested himself in the Fleckten case and showed me many documents relating to it. During the day I met Mr. Ole Hagen, who edits a Norwegian paper which is open to Freethought articles. I can report great progress in Crookston since my visit last September. Our Scandinavian friends have organized a society, and have regular Sunday meetings, as well as a regular speaker, Mr. John L. Erickson. This gentleman grew out of the Methodist ministry into Freethought, and he has made a stir in Crookston and vicinity. The Lutheran preachers complain that he is dividing their churches and taking away their support, and one of them proposed to drive him out of town, which made everybody smile. Sunday nights he has a hall full of listeners. He introduced me to a crowded house, which he said was a specimen of his regular audiences. I only wish that all of our American friends were as active as our Scandinavian brethren. If they were, Liberalism would be a tower of strength. When I go to Crookston again I can expect to see even greater progress.

From Crookston I go to lecture in Lakota, Hoople, and Park River, N. D.; Red Jacket, Mich.; Omega and Greenwood, Wis., and Mapleton and Adrian, Minn. Liberals should address me at box 882, Des Moines, Ia., for lectures in these states.

The Continental Sunday in Full Swing.

The following, from Mr. Ernest Law's "History of Hampton Court Palace," under the above heading, may be of interest to your readers:

"To anyone who would like to know what a 'free Sunday' means we would commend a visit to Hampton Court some afternoon of that day in the height of the summer. He will then witness—what is to be seen in no other place in Great Britain—the much-dreaded 'Continental Sunday' in full swing, within twelve miles of Charing Cross. Arriving by the crowded train, and standing for a moment on the center of the bridge, a bright and animated scene meets the eye. On all sides are to be seen hundreds of omnibuses, vans, char-à-bancs, brakes, cabs, dog carts, and carriages and conveyances of all sorts, including several coaches, all of which have brought their parties for the palace, the gardens, the park, and the river. On the river below, above all, the scene is of the gayest; it is often so crowded with rowing boats, steam launches, sailing-boats with various colored sails, and boat-houses decked with drapery and flowers, that one would imagine a regatta was going on. Through Molesley Lock, also, just above the bridge, ceaseless streams, literally of hundreds, of pleasure-boats, each with its merry party of holiday-makers, pass all day long; while upon the banks stroll throngs of young people, not perked out in 'Sunday-go-to-meeting best,' but men rationally dressed in easy shooting-suits or flannels, and girls in neat and pretty lawn-tennis or boating costumes. In the mean while, perhaps, down stream, from the lawn of a riverside club, opposite William III.'s Terrace or long walk, there is a 'sound of music on the waters' in the lively strains of the last new waltz; while a crowd of boats gathers around, and on the ear drops the light drip of the suspended oar. To exchange a scene like this, with all its freshness, naturalness, and 'abandon,' for the hot London streets and parks on Sunday, with their conventional dressed up crowds, strutting, prayer-book (or Bible) prominently in hand, or crawling in dense masses by Rotten Row, enables us to judge how heavy is the load of formalism that still weighs upon English life."—Exchange.

Observations.

Through an oversight on my part Mr. Putnam was not instructed before leaving these shores to refrain from guessing over on the other side. When in doubt, but inclined to take an affirmative view, he must now say that he fancies. Down South people "reckon" when putting forward an opinion tentatively. The Ohio citizen "allows" instead of prophesying, while out west of the Rockies they encourage the doubter to wager his existence—"Betch 'er life" there meaning all that is conveyed by the terms previously mentioned. It is only New England Yankees and those whose speech has been corrupted by contact with them who guess or even "callate." None of these Americanisms is in it with the Britishism, "fancy," or fahncy. To allow is merely to acquiesce, while to reckon, bet, guess, or calculate suggests a mathematical operation modified by the element of chance. "Fancy," belonging to the domain of the imagination, yields more gratifying results. For example, a man with 75 cents in his pocket could neither guess, calculate, allow, nor safely bet that he has more, but he can fancy that he has a dollar and a half, and not lose his reputation for prudence. Say "fancy," Put.

It is a little disquieting to hear that a descendant and namesake of Revolutionary sires got nervous at the sound of a British cheer, though I suppose that if the truth were told the same sound sometimes rattled our forefathers. But it is wholly according to tradition that our representative now in England warmed to his work and took his audience with him.

If the "Ode to Paine," the words and notes of which are contained in this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, shall win from Freethinkers such appreciation as the melody of it would command if adapted to more popular lines, it will be republished as sheet music. It will go, I think, at Paine celebrations and on other occasions where the people desire to sing without being indebted to the orthodox for either words or tune. Mr. J. R. Macdonald, writer of the music, is a member of the Brooklyn Philosophical Association and has sung many times at its meetings. The audiences are witnesses to the quality of his song. After casting off the job of printing the words and music, with impressive introduction and inspiring accompaniment, and estimating the number likely to be sold, the price has been placed at 30 cents per copy. I have nothing to say about the words except that, through the offices of my colleague, they have had greatness thrust upon them.

One paper in Oregon, one in Texas, one in Illinois, and one in Alabama are quoted in Public Opinion as approving the killing of Brown by Gordon in Louisville, Ky. One editor, he of the Chicago Journal, expounds the law thus: "Marriage is not a contract between a man and a woman merely, but between society as one party and the man and the woman as the other party. Under this contract violation of the vow by the woman is tacitly made a capital crime by the accumulated experience of centuries, and the man is made executioner of the sentence when the facts have imposed it." The impression I get from the blood-curdling utterances of these editors is that they have been so unfortunate as to get wives whom they cannot trust out of sight, and that they are talking through their hats to scare them.

Next in rank to the gun-bearing husband as a public nuisance is the swashbuckling brother who regards himself as chosen by destiny to oversmear with blood the stains upon his family's honor. Here in New York last March a young woman named Hannigan found herself in an embarrassing condition through her relations with one Mann, the superintendent of a Fifth avenue tailor shop where she was employed as typewriter. She submitted to a dangerous operation, and became ill. Before she had time to recover, her brother met Mann at her bedside and by drawing a pistol and endeavoring to shoot him frightened her so that she died. Mann was arraigned on account of her death and held for trial under $10,000 bonds. Last week the fool brother met Mann in the street and killed him; so that, up to date, we have two deaths instead of one, neither of which was excusable, and if the law takes its course Hannigan will go to the executioner's chair. With judges who discharge murderers and with editors who applaud them, this sort of thing is likely to continue for a good many years to come. But the judges and the editors will not bear all the responsibility. Girls who go out into the world to earn their living under conditions which expose them to danger are not provided with such information as would make it unnecessary for them to risk their lives on a cure worse than the disease. That information being prohibited by Anthony Comstock and his abettors, they will be accessories before the fact in cases like this. Furthermore, there is room for a change in the attitude of society toward girl offenders, many of whom break the seventh commandment more virtuously than it is kept by those who utilize them as scapegoats. Society, therefore, which encourages the Comstocks and drives the social culprits to infamy or death, is particeps criminis twice over, and is to be doubly damned. As one who has no opportunity or inducement to be otherwise than good, I might follow the example of those who mistake old age and obtunded instincts for moral evolution, and solemnly warn the young against yielding to temptation. But that has been done for thousands of years without any noticeable results, and the industry is still overcrowded. Besides, the victims are not the chief offenders.

These avengers who do the shooting should insist upon paying the penalty of their acts. Since they profess that it is their devotion to honor which prompts them to take the lives of others, let them prove their sincerity by giving their own to the same cause. Anyone can afford to be the vindicator of honor when nothing is involved but temporary personal inconvenience offset by gratified vanity.

Should all signers of the call for that political conference at Prohibition Park, Staten Island, the last of this month, maintain their loyalty to the principles which have hitherto distinguished them, the occasion may not be a harmonious one. There ought not to be anything in common, except enmity toward each other, between Freethinkers and the crowd of suppressionists who will compose the bulk of that gathering. If Wilbur F. Crafts, once field secretary of the American Sabbath Union and now an officer of the God-in-the-Constitution party, should discover that Mr. T. B. Wakeman is the former president of the National Liberal League, trouble will begin then and there, I hope. Nor will the cordiality be any more marked between Mr. Wakeman and Mrs. Burt, the female Comstock, who moves, steers, and has her living through the postal laws for the repeal of which Mr. Wakeman labored so hard a few years ago. When she learns his record she will tuck away her skirts like a washerwoman wringing a mop. It ought also to be lonely in that crowd for Charles Sotheran, B. O. Flower, and all other Freethinkers. Even woman suffrage can have no attraction for Liberals when it is advocated, not as a right, but as a means to an end, and that end the union of church and state. In looking over the list of signers of the call I do not recognize the names of any individualists. They all belong to the time when humanity was herded by shepherds who appointed themselves—before the day of popular constitutions founded in personal liberty, and when it was decided without argument that the individual had no rights which society would be excusable in respecting. The people who lived a few hundred years ago knew of no source of authority except the Bible and the church, and their laws were as good as could be expected when we consider the source, but apologies ample for them will not exculpate the Crafts, the Comstocks, and the Funks of to-day, nor their accomplices. No virtue that these "reformers" would substitute for the present order could counterbalance the vice of enforcing it with clubs, mulets, and dungeons. Compared with what the conference at Prohibition Park would give us, the persistence of the saloon is something to be thankful for; for while the saloon men are not distinguished as champions of any other rights than their own, their business at least provides a morass through which the enemy must wallow before assaulting the heights of liberty at close quarters.

The discussion that has been going on in religious circles since Easter over the question whether Christ arose spiritually or physically is revealing to Infidels, who don't believe he arose at all, the fun there is in sitting among the spectators while a religious scrap is in progress.

Did Christ arise from the dead and ascend into heaven as, for illustration, a man goes up in a balloon?—that is the business before the house. The creed to which every orthodox person puts his name or his mark says that he did—that he "took again his body with flesh, bones, and all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature, wherewith he ascended into heaven, and there sitteth until he return to judge all men at the last day." Those who would be saved must also believe or profess to believe that, in the language of said creed, "there is but one living and true God everlasting, without body, parts, or passions;" which God, however, is composed of three parts—Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. As the creed puts it, "in the unity of this Godhead there be three persons of one substance, power, and eternity." But Christ having arisen and joined the trinity with his body and "all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature," it is left for the believers in the resurrection to say why the Trinity has not at least one body in its composition; and retaining their grasp on the fact that the body of Christ is of "flesh, bones," and so forth, and that the three persons be of "one substance," as aforesaid, they have on their hands the further duty of explaining in a clear and convincing manner their reasons for holding that the entire Trinity is not of flesh and bones.

The bodily resurrection and ascension of Christ, and his identity in substance with the other members of the Trinity, give us a Father and Holy Ghost with flesh and bones and "all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature." The same Holy Ghost being the immediate progenitor of Christ, as we are assured, the latter was of necessity begotten of the flesh; hence follows the flesh-and-blood paternity of Christ, while the virginity of Mary—who presumably was gifted with all things appertaining to the perfection of woman's nature—must be abandoned as an untenable hypothesis. Thus does one dogma of religion deal another a fatal stab and then, sheathing the weapon in its own duodenum, fall over the lifeless body of its victim.

The man who said he believed in the resurrection because it was manifestly impossible gave the only good and sufficient reason that I ever heard.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

Buddhism vs. Christianity.

At the Manhattan Liberal Club on Friday evening, May 24th, the lecturer was Swami Vivekananda, and the subject, "Religion." After listening to him for an hour one can no longer wonder that the waves of missionary Christianity beat vainly against the rock-defended shores of the Buddhistic East. As Lafcadio Hearn says, the Orient has nothing to gain and much to lose by an exchange of its sublime philosophies for the Christian system. And as one follows the closely reasoned, logical, discriminating, and eloquent discourse of this Hindu it is no longer a matter of surprise to him that the educated "heathen" look with condescension and contempt upon the religions and philosophies of the West. Face to face with the venerable wisdom of India the Westerner feels indeed that he is of a civilization that is young, and trifling, and crude, and anti-human. His intellectual and moral poverty is realized as never before. With the calm, rich tones of Swami Vivekananda falling on my ear and his opulent thought feeding my mind, I remembered Talmage and Mills and the rest of the men who talk to the multitudes of the crucified Christ, and my sense of proportion was shocked by the abyss of contrast that yawned between this representative of the cultus of Buddha the reformer and those mental contortionists of the Christian pulpit. Such men can never comprehend the people and the religious and moral systems to which they are sending their swarms of callow graduates of theological schools. The thought of the East is too subtle, too profound for them to grasp. They hate it because they do not understand it, but if they did understand it they would hate it still more virulently, for its lofty morality would sting them as with the lash of personal castigation.

This is not saying that Buddhism, as expounded by Swami Vivekananda, is in all respects intellectually acceptable to the Western Freethinker, for it is too metaphysical, having the faults that are inevitably associated with an excess of introspection and a lack of practical contact with nature. But these defects we need not now pause to consider, for we would then at once be involved in the old battle between the objective and the subjective. The salient thought here is that, whatever the logical shortcomings of Buddhism, it is yet so immeasurably the superior of the Christian theology that any attempted comparison of the two would be cruelly invidious. All that I can do is to give in a very imperfect way a few of the thoughts expressed by the lecturer.

In ancient times in the East there was first the thirst for continuous life, and men thought deeply and long upon this problem. But gradually there came a change, and the thirst for knowledge took the place of the thirst for immortality. Man struggles for unity; he labors to bring various and diverse phenomena into harmonious relation; this is the goal of knowledge, unity. Here Eastern philosophy becomes at one with Western science. There were thirty-two of the Devas. The word means bright. They were human in their nature. The conception of a God pleased by worship and sacrifice gave place to the conception of cause and effect. The present is because the past was, and so on infinitely. A beginning to space and time is unthinkable. There cannot be an infinity with a finite side. Following this comes the thought, Why not let the universe explain itself? Why go outside of nature for a cause? The universe is bound by law. "This is the reformation of Buddha." What of the origin of the human race? We cannot solve the problem. What is the origin of me as I am? All my past. What the origin of that? All the past. One sect of Buddhists hold that there is no unity back of phenomena. The soul is a dream. The forces that were acting in that man were not an individual force. The wave spends its force and another wave is the result; the individual wave is no more, but waves result from waves, and so on unendingly. The most rigorous logical conclusion is that there is no future for the "soul" and no past. Death and birth are unmeaning words. Is there any background outside of this universe, and, if so, what is its relation to this universe? We can find no extra-cosmic cause.

It is only by its limitations that we cognize anything. We describe it by what it is not.

There is the universal being, that is ME. We cannot hurt any one that the pain does not ultimately come back to us. All have the right to help but not to bind down. Perfect liberty we seek, to flow into the infinit, as the stream comes down the Himalayas to become one again with its parent ocean. Every creed helps until it says, "Thus far and no farther."

Was the tree first, or the seed? Did sound create the ear, or the ear create sound? Did the sun form the eye, or was the eye made to see the sun? And similarly of all the other senses. These are not new questions. Thousands of years ago they were argued in the East. The answer is, Sound creates the ear. Thus was modern science anticipated.

In the past every new truth has become the property of a class. If in any nation the priests secure a monopoly of knowledge, that nation must die. In Europe the priests were coarse, and brutal, and savage. In their fierce greed to grasp power and wealth and hold the world in their fanatic hands they overreached themselves, and the reaction came quickly. Besides they were uneducated. They were too vulgar, too gross, too cruel to last long. In a way, they were of immense service to the world. Their atrocious persecutions arrayed humanity against them. They made a tremendous negativ springing board from which reason could take a start. So a new era began in the external world. To the internal world Peter holds the key. The struggle is going on still. Few scientific men dare say anything that will offend the priesthood. In India the priests were more adroit. There was there none of the brutality of persecution. There was complete toleration. But none the less, they enslaved the nations. The Brahmins were subtle; they slowly and gently wound the victim about with silken cords, attenuated thread on thread, until he was immovably bound.

Effect follows cause and becomes cause. We say that "law governs everything." But law is subjective. The law is here in my head, not behind the sequence of events. Things occur so and so, and we say it is the law that they should so occur. This is Scientific Superstition No. 1. If I get whipped one day I say that this is an isolated phenomenon, and hence is an outrage. If I get whipped every day I say, That is my nature, that is law, so it is all right.

Masonic Hall was packed. Every seat was filled and many persons stood through the lecture. The closest attention was paid to the address and Swami Vivekananda had to pause often for the applause to subside. E. C. W.

"A New Order in the East."

"Christian civilization" is somewhat discounted by certain of its usual defenders since the terms of peace between China and Japan were made known and Russia, France, and Germany intervened to nullify some of the provisions of the treaty. Under the head of "A New Order in the East," the New York Tribune of May 16th calls attention to a few facts constituting a comparison between Japan and the self-vaunted "Christian powers" of Europe that is decidedly unfavorable to the latter. "Not in the memory of man," it says, "has any other conquering power imposed such terms upon its fallen foe. The rule has been that 'to the victor belong the spoils,' and usually the spoils have been taken in a manner calculated to humiliate the beaten nation as much as possible." Then it points out the discreditable features in the terms of peace imposed by Germany upon France, in the treatment of Siam by France, of Turkestan and Turkey by Russia, and of England's dealings with all conquered states. Next it shows that Japan could have done likewise with China, had she chosen, but instead she had the peace conference held on her own territory, "and the whole tone of the negotiations was that of a conference between equals, instead of between victor and vanquished." Of course the terms of peace were favorable to Japan, but they were not unduly or needlessly humiliating to China, "and they secure—apart, of course, from the indemnity and the cession of Formosa—no advantages for Japan which are not also freely extended to all the world." Corea is made independent; "China must relax some of her barbarous laws toward all foreigners as well as Japanese. China must open her harbors and rivers to the commerce not of Japan alone but of the world. China must permit the introduction of machinery, not merely from the shops of Japan, but from those of England and Germany and America as well. Japan, in brief, has simply done what for many years the European powers have wanted to do, but have been too jealous of each other to do. She has 'opened' China. But she has done so not as England or Germany or Russia would have done, for exclusiv selfish gain, but for the common gain of the whole world." The islands that she has taken, including Formosa, are geographically a part of her empire and over them China has had a control only merely nominal. If it is true as reported that Japan will make Formosa autonomous she will set another startling example to the world. As the Tribune says, "That is not the way in which a conquered province is usually disposed of. A military dictatorship or a crown colony system would seem more in order." Verily the missionaries must think that "the heathen rage," and have set our Christian editors of secular papers to raging also. We do not believe in standing armies and great sea armaments, but we are glad indeed that at last a pagan nation stands fronting the robber Christian powers that have been utterly without conscience or mercy in their fierce and cruel march to empire. We are sincerely glad that Japan has plenty of guns and ships and the men who know how to use them. We believe that it is a bond for the peace of the world, and a guarantee for the preservation of very much that is beautiful, true, and useful in the civilizations that the Eastern nations have developed.

An Exceptional Universalist Minister.

Rev. T. B. Gregory, of Halifax, N. S., has been preaching on trial in the Church of the Redeemer, Chicago, and one newspaper of that city says that it is believed that he has won the pulpit of that church. In one of his sermons, on the "Martyrdom of Man," he said these among other good things: "The church destroys virtue, reason, and happiness. It tells us that by nature we are a set of degraded wretches, and that such we must remain until the virtue of another is imputed to us. The world's manhood has grown only as we have despised the teachings of the theologians and, planting ourselves on the doctrine of the worth of man, have acted upon the principle that we must be saved by the salt that is in ourselves. And the church destroys reason. With its vaunted infallibilities it paralyzes the mind and transforms us into driving idiots. The march of mind has evermore been opposed by the theologians, and whatever has been done in the way of science and the arts of life has been accomplished not by the help of the church but in spite of her. Happiness, too, the church has persistently worked against. Millions of hearts have been made wretched by her bogies and spooks. For eighteen centuries the theologians put a premium on misery and a curse on joy. They damned the happy man and canonized the wretch who hated smiles and gladness. The church, instead of freeing men and assisting them to the realization of the fullest life, fettered them and kept them from making any progress at all."

That is pretty straight gospel to come from the lips of a Universalist preacher, but all that he said was not so straight; this, for instance: "We must get back to Jesus and his doctrine that the Sabbath and everything else was made for man. By that great idea all questions are to be measured. The mighty problems of the day will never be solved, nor the conflict quieted, till all lying sophistries shall have gone down before the Christ truth that humanity is a sacred thing and its rights are to be sacredly respected." That is badly tangled up with religion. Nothing belongs to, or was made for, man that he is not able to take by strength of muscle or brain. To this fact earthquake and pestilence and famine bear testimony. As to what is attributed to Jesus, Mr. Gregory should not forget that, if he depends upon the Bible—as he must—for his information concerning that individual, he will be compelled to accept some very foolish and some very intolerant and invasi teachings—the great bulk, in fact, of all the utterances that have been credited to the Jesus of the gospels will fall into one or the other of these categories. And why does so apparently bright a man as this clergyman talk of "the Christ truth"? Christ is not a name; it means the "greased," or the "anointed," and so at best is but a title. Who would speak of the "emperor truth" if referring to some utterance of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius? The whole trend of the teachings of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount was against the "Christ truth" that the rights of man are to be respected. Absolute non-resistance to theft and assault never inculcated the lesson of respect for the rights of humanity, and yet such non-resistance is a fundamental part of that "Christ truth" in which alone Mr. Gregory sees hope for humanity.

What Christendom Owes to the "Heathen."

In the New York Tribune of May 19th we find this fair estimate of the effects of the Crusades on "Christian" civilization, and the article shows how the contact of Christianity with the East, which was brought about by the Crusades, was a benefit to the West: "To-morrow, just eight hundred years will have passed away since the memorable 20th of May, on which Peter the Hermit preached that great sermon at Clermont, which resulted in the organization of the first Crusade; and great preparations have been made not only in that ancient town, but also throughout France, to commemorate the anniversary in a suitable manner. It is an anniversary which concerns not alone France, but the whole of the civilized world. For, although the Crusades themselves were mere wars of aggression and bloodshed, characterized by much barbarity and fanaticism, yet it cannot be denied that they contributed in a powerful manner to promote the progress and enlightenment of the Western nations. The latter were through these sanguinary conflicts brought into contact with Oriental races, who, at any rate, in those dark days possessed an intellectual, an artistic, and a scientific development far superior to anything of the kind in the Occident, which, therefore, owes a deep debt of gratitude to Asia. Indeed, had it not been for the knowledge which our forbears obtained through intercourse with the Saracens and other Eastern races in connection with the Crusades, we might to-day be two centuries behind our present era of civilization." In other words, the dull blade of the Christian intellect was sharpened by its fierce attrition with the polished steel of Saracen culture.

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. REMSBURG is now lecturing in the Northwest. He will speak in Macedonia, Carson, Boone, Eldora, Elgin, Popejoy, Peoria, Humeston, Russell, and Olin, Iowa; Luverne, Fairmont, Mapleton, New Auburn, Sherburne, Sterling Center, New Ulm, Barnum, Lake Heron, and Minneapolis, Minn.; Arcadia, Independence, Whitehall, Blair, Mondovi, Gilmantown, Seymour, Dale, Beaver Dam, Lodi, and Oakland, Wisconsin.

FRANKLIN STEINER lectures in Red Jacket, Mich., June 1st and 2d; Omega, Wis., June 5th; Greewood, Wis., June 8th and 9th.

THE Detroit Investigator's society meets at 45 Monroe avenue every Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock. All Liberal persons are invited to attend these meetings. Stanley Kleindienst, Recording Secretary.

THE Friendship Liberal League, George Longford, secretary, meets at 2:30 and 7:30, every Sunday in Warner's Hall, Broad and Wallace streets, Philadelphia. Freethought publications are on sale at the meeting.

THE Soranton Secular Union meets every Friday evening at 421 Lackawanna avenue. Our motto: Freedom and Kindness. Everybody invited. Secretary, William Watkins.

THE Fellowship for Ethical Research meets Wednesday at 8.15 p.m., at Mercantile Library Hall, Tenth below Market street, Philadelphia.

Christians Not Ready to Die.

HACKLEMAN, IND., May 7, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find twenty-five cents, for which please send "Miracles and Miracle-Workers;" "Limitations of Toleration," and "Infidels and Charity."

I hav just finished reading THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 4th, and feel that I must express my complete satisfaction with it. I was especially pleased with Heston's cartoon in which he represented Satan placing Christ on the pinnacle of the temple. The closeness with which Christ is clinging to the temple reminds me of the manner in which Christians cling to life, although they are always singing and shouting, "How I long to be with Jesus." Long liv Heston and THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Fraternally yours, A. R. BUMPAS.

Quit Helping the Enemy.

May 12, E.M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: The priests, worse than pirates, continue begging money to build churches for God, while people are starving for the actual necessities to continue life.

They begged of me for money to build a house for God. I asked, Cannot an almighty God build houses for himself, if he needs more than one?

And I said, further, I will never give one cent to build a house for God, really the priests, common pirates, until I see a God build a good house, large and tall, for the poor widow, orphan, or old man. Let every Freethinker in America make this his rule, and you would soon hav an end of this rotten, despotic, and corrupting thing called Christianity.

I ask a priest why God or the gods sit on the fence playing the fiddle while cruel men break into a dwelling-house where are aged women, commit an assault upon them—hold their tender feet against a hot stove and beat them with clubs almost to insensibility, in order to compel them to give to the Christian robbers their scant funds that they depend upon for their sustenance?

Such occurrences hav taken place three times lately in the Christian Sunday-law-cursed state of Pennsylvania. The priests, and priest-ridden courts, claim that this is a Christian country, then, of course, Christianity is responsible for all the corruption and murders in the United States. They tell us that it is not God that commits all these crimes by men, women, and children in this nation, but it is the devil. But this shuffling will not do, as there can be but one almighty power in the universe—the principal. The devil is simply his agent, and can do nothing except by authority and direction of the principal. It is a universal rule of law that the principal is liable for the declarations and acts of his agent. In this case the agent is the "creation" of God—the principal. He could not exist a moment except by the direct command of God. Is it not as easy for God to kill the devil as it was for him to kill Abigail's husband in order that David could take her as he did Bathsheba to wife?

There is nothing else on earth that will cause men to lie, steal, kill each other, and act the fool, as will religion. The priests are not satisfied with such means to protect and maintain their God and their false and cruel religion, but they are determined to capture our public schools, and manage to hav enacted unjust, cruel, and infamous Sunday observance, and other tyrannical human laws, to defend their gods and their tottering church and religion.

Just think of a God that is so feeble that he, she, or it, requires human laws, policemen, sheriffs, and soldiers to prevent this God from being dethroned and banished from earth—"from the universe"—as "the man of God" declares.

Let us all labor to hav all ecclesiastical property taxed at its full value; keep religion out of our public schools; teach justice and pure morality; the practical things of life, and the people would soon be free from all the evils of religion.

A Defense of Judas Iscariot.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., May 8, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: At frequent intervals the clergy take delight in defaming the character of the dead and in making attacks on those whose voices hav been silenced forever, and from whom no reply is among the possibilities. It is evident from press reports that a Los Angeles clergyman is the latest to vilify the dead; and the coarse and brutal manner in which he jumps on the prostrate and long-silent form of Judas Iscariot rouses my sense of justice to that pitch that I cannot sit in silence while the voiceless are thus maligned.

"Judas," says this untruthful preacher, "was an avaricious man and a thief, and few men hav been considered viler than he; and the crime of Judas"—meaning the betrayal of Jesus—"seems peculiarly dark and heinous." In this strain he continued to execrate this well-decayed corpse; but no evidence was presented to prove the charge of Judas having been a thief; and his avarice was discovered only in the fact that he took thirty pieces of silver as the price of his crime. Now it is my duty to clear his memory from these base charges, and to place him before a cold and indifferent world, which has ever lent a willing ear to calumny, in his true light.

Judas was a good man, and only acted as God intended he should act. Now for the evidence. It is generally understood that God sent his son Jesus into this world to undergo crucifixion that his anger might be appeased toward sinful man through the shedding of that son's blood. I think there is no dispute on this point; therefore it naturally follows that God had to provide ways and means for consummating the death of Jesus, or be the executioner himself. He chose the former, and Judas Iscariot and Pontius Pilate were simply the tools of this tragedy of God Almighty, who hypnotized them for the occasion and compelled them to carry out his will, i.e., that Jesus should die to save sinners. As Jesus had to be killed it was necessary for some one to betray him as well as to execute him, and if all the acts in this divine tragedy occurred as God foreordained them—and who can doubt it—then Judas was not only blameless for his conduct, but he filled a most important part in the salvation scheme for saving sinners, and all of us hav good reason to thank instead of censure him. Had he failed to perform his allotted part the great scheme would hav proved abortiv; for of course the officers could never hav found Jesus without his aid in identifying him. So in that case we would hav been forever lost, the bare thought of which should lead every thoughtful person to speak well of Judas, for if Jesus had eluded the officers and died a natural death of old age, such a death would hav done no good, and none of us would hav been "ransomed from the fall." We would hav gone to hell sure without the aid of Judas, and no sensible theologian will deny it; so I implore the preachers who blindly curse and denounce him, to get rid of their rank prejudices and view Judas as he was, the divine instrument in helping to save mortal man from the wrath of God.

Now let this unjust censure by the clergy cease forever, for if justice was done to his memory none of us would rest until a mighty monument, commensurate with the glorious part he took in opening up heaven as a place of residence, was erected over his much-disturbed remains. As suicide has been declared a sin by the vote of intelligent New Yorkers, I wish to show that Judas was not guilty of that offense as charged by the Los Angeles preacher in his diatribe. First reports are often erroneous, and the one given in Matt. xxvii, 5, saying he hanged himself, was a false one, as is fully proven by later news found in Acts i, 18, where the actual facts are truthfully told in these words: "And falling headlong he burst asunder in the midst, and his bowels gushed out." His untimely death resulted from an accident pure and simple; and the preacher who ever accuses him again of suicide will only manifest his ignorance of the scriptures and the necessity of a more complete knowledge of God's word. The vindication of Judas is now complete, and like truth crushed to earth he will soon rise in the estimation of a deeply indebted public, and shine with a halo of glory beside the chief actor in the divine tragedy for our benefit. Judas, our friend, we salute you.

RICHMOND, VA., May 7, 295.

MR. EDITOR: It is apparent to the most casual observer that the large majority of church-going people do not really enjoy the sermon they hear preached every Sunday. They are heard often to remark, "Oh, we hav such a poor preacher; he is so tiresome to listen to." The music is also as often criticised in the same disparaging manner. Although religion has paralyzed their reasoning function to such an extent that they attend the house of worship two or three times a week, and endure its monotonous services, and are led to believe the most absurd things ever written, it seems they still hav left enough common sense to admit that this "divine service" is not as entertaining as it should be. And no wonder they make such a confession, for the man they are compelled to listen to is simply an automatic machine that has been stuffed with theology, and mechanically reiterates parables and fables that hav been heard a thousand times, occasionally introducing something original which is of no value whatever. The music is furnished by a choir of cracked voices, accompanied by a creaky old organ whose discordant notes are a sad travesty on music. Having to pass through such a trying ordeal so frequently it is no wonder the Christian looks forlorn. I desire to suggest a plan that I think would mitigate the above nuisance and ultimately abolish the orthodox church forever. Instead of each community having so many churches, let there be erected a grand auditorium with a seating capacity of ten or twenty thousand; the interior and exterior to be embellished with all the wealth of art. Let this magnificent building be called "The Church of Humanity," and let every mortal, irrespective of creed or nationality, be welcome within its walls. Let there be a coterie of superb singers and a grand orchestra that would make the heart throb with joy. Get some entertaining philosopher—a man of brains, unhampered by dogmas and absurdities—to address the vast audience, inculcating the ideas of right living rather than traditional doctrines. Let him preach the religion of humanity, the religion of temperance, honesty, charity, and morality, and not the religion of ignorance, fear, and superstition—that relic of barbarism—the climax of folly. To listen to such a man after hearing for years the sanctimonious groans and mad ravings of the clergyman, would be as refreshing as a cool breeze in the hot days of summer. No preacher could occupy such a platform—they are too devoid of humor—they are too sad; were the solemnity of theologians infectious, the entire human family would die of melancholia. Wanted—A man of wisdom and of humor, one who could tell us how to be happy here in this world, and not give such graphic accounts of the two worlds after this. When a man tells us of the beauties of heaven and the horrors of hell, we lose confidence in him; we know immortality is the unknowable. It is a sealed chest that no human being can unlock; therefore, its contents will ever be a mystery. Tell us something about this planet upon which we dwell, and about which we know so little. By having fewer churches and consequently fewer preachers, mediocrity would be weeded out—only the fittest could survive. I am in favor of the elimination of all ceremonies and creeds. The question is, are they requisite to the welfare of mankind? Is baptism a preventive of crime; is it conducive to honesty, or is it productive of any good whatever? Then if it is not, it should be discarded. I am in favor of nothing that will not make men and women nobler, grander, and happier, and I am satisfied it will never be accomplished through the instrumentality of any ceremony or form. If there were no dogmas and useless red-tape to contend with, there would be nothing for people to contend about regarding religion. Everybody believes in morality and justice, and our ideas about Gods and eternity would be of no consequence whatever so far as other people are concerned, because they would simply be our pet theories which the majority would admit were merely conjecture. There is nothing Utopian in hoping for the time to come when all prejudices will be banished from the minds of men, and people with diametrically opposite opinions can dwell together harmoniously. May it not be a great while before ceremonies, technicalities, and paraphernalia will sink into innocuous desuetude, and "The Church of Humanity" will reign supreme.

DANIEL J. PAXTON.

"Divine" vs. Human Justice.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., May 16, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Some time ago the Times of this city printed an article written by me upon our state prison religious census. Three days later it announced that Rev. D. C. Milne, of Manhattan, would reply to it in the next Sunday's issue. But the reverend gentleman reconsidered the matter and did not send in his answer.

To make a bad matter worse the Manhattan Mercury reprinted my article, asked the dominie why he failed to reply in the Times as proposed, and offered him the use of its columns to make any reply or statement he saw fit. And still he kept mum.

Later, J. B. Blackman, a friend of mine, took the preachers severely to task in the Standard of this city in regard to criminal statistics. Reverend McLain replied to this, but Brother Blackman, for some reason, concluded not to respond and turned him over to me. Below I hand you the answer I gave him. It evidently satisfied him, as nothing has been heard from him since.

S. R. SHEPHERD.

In a late number of your journal Rev. Mr. McLain asks, "What part of the gospel is it that sends people to the penitentiary?" The question is certainly a proper one. If there is a broken cog, a bent pinion, or a loose burr somewhere in the gospel machine that causes it to work imperfectly, we want to find it out and repair it. It is admitted that the penitentiaries are filled with persons who hav had Christian rearing, who believe in the Christian religion, and one-half of whom hav been members of churches; that a greater percentage of preachers commit crimes than do the members of other professions, arts, and trades; that there is more drunkenness, vice, pauperism, and crime in Christian countries than in others.

Now, why is it? That is what we want to know. If a man or nation is going to make selection of a religion he wants the best the market will afford. He wants the one that will produce the greatest morality and the least crime. One reason why the Christian tree bears so much bad fruit is this: It is the only religion that decries and discards morality, counting it as naught, as filthy rags, and pointing to the moral non-Christian as a dangerous man; the only religion teaching that morality drags more souls down to hell than vice or crime; that morality is the devil's snare and pitfall. That faith is the great and only desideratum. That by faith are ye justified, by faith are ye saved, and not by good works or excellence of conduct. You can do nothing to fit yourself for heaven or merit eternal happiness. Cast your deadly doing down, believe, be baptized and you are saved. Good conduct counts you nothing—it is rather against you.

Christianity stakes everything on faith; Mohammedanism makes both faith and morals essential; the religions of Asia throw faith to the dogs, but enforce the practice of the highest human virtues as elaborated in their codes of morals. The so-called Pagan earns his seat in heaven by good conduct. In oriental lands every attainment, whether in education, society, politics, or morals, is won by merit and not by purchase, fraud, or favor. The oriental attains felicity in the next life by restraining his propensities, cultivating the nobler virtues, and faithfully discharging all his moral and social obligations in this life. He cannot afford to do wrong, for he knows he must pay the utmost penalty. His religion harmonizes with common sense, reason, science, and all the known laws of the universe. The Christian religion antagonizes all of these.

Why should not the Sunday-school prove a nursery for the gallows and the penitentiary? Children there are taught that "Jesus pays it all—all the debt I owe," that the vilest may repent at the eleventh hour and get the best reserved seats in heaven. No incentive to be good. The child believes this wretched doctrine—believes that he can do as he pleases all his life, and run up as big a bill with the devil as he wants to—Jesus pays the account—it will all be wiped out—God will be overjoyed to see him repent on his death bed; the viler he is the fatter the calf that will be killed to celebrate his return. Every convict at Lansing [Kansas penitentiary] was fed on such spoon victuals as that and every one of them intends to avail himself, before he dies, of the gospel "scheme" of salvation and get a deadhead ticket to the realms of glory. This is what they call "vicarious atonement." A scheme to manufacture moral spendthrifts, somebody else paying the bills; a scheme to fill up the penitentiaries.

Suppose a father finds his four bad boys stealing and his only good boy remonstrating and begging them not to commit the wicked deed. What should he do? According to that pernicious doctrine he should fly at the good boy and beat him to death, or have it done, as propitiation for the sin of the guilty. Having propitiated himself he then forgives the bad boys and hugs them to his bosom. And this is so-called divine justice, the innocent suffering for the sins of the guilty. Benson [a notorious woman-killer of Leavenworth] ought to have been given a pardon, a clean new suit of white linen clothes, a harp, and a halo, and some innocent person strung up for the murder he committed.

Human justice says, "Punish the guilty and spare the innocent." But that is all wrong. Divine justice says, "Punish the innocent, but spare the guilty." That is right. Suppose we make an experiment of divine justice in Kansas. Suppose the governor offers a pardon and a corner-lot in the pious, Magdalen-mobbing city of Larned to every convict in the penitentiary who will become a hypocrite, snivel a little, and say he is sorry. Suppose our criminal code is repealed and a new one enacted granting forty acres of land, a pension, and a pardon to every person who commits a crime. What a beautiful place Kansas would be to live in after a while—wouldn't it? What a heavenly state of society would soon be developed.

And yet that is divine justice according to the dogmas and teachings of the Christian religion. Is it any wonder that our penitentiaries are filled with Sunday-school pupils, church members, and believers in the Christian system of faith?

Nothing could encourage, foster, and promote crime so much as openly proclaimed and promised immunity from any penalty therefor. The gospel proclaims that immunity and thus invites men to lead criminal lives. There is more joy in heaven over the arrival of one redeemed and pardoned murderer than over that of ninety and nine who never went astray.

The reason why the morality of Asia is above that of Europe and the Americas is because the Eastern religions teach and enforce morality, while Christianity teaches faith and belief. Her motto is, Believe and be saved; believe not and be damned. Conduct is not in it. Morality is nowhere.

The inmates of our pen are all "believers" in the Christian plan of salvation. Their faith was evidently the regulation faith that saves from penalty but not from sin. Their doctrinal soundness cannot be questioned. It is the most orthodox community in the state of Kansas. S. R. S.

Does Elohim Mean God or Gods?

JANESVILLE, WIS., May 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The controversy which has lately been going on in THE TRUTH SEEKER as to whether Elohim is the singular or the plural is one of much interest. The evidence showing that Elohim means "the gods" seems to me much the more conclusively. Volney in his "New Researches" says that Elohim means the gods, as is admitted by all grammarians (see page 176). The compilers of the Bible did not venture to discard a word consecrated by custom. These Elohim were the same as the Decans of the Egyptians, the geni of the months and planets among the Persians and the Chaldeans.

The Phœnician author, Sanchoniathon, places the matter beyond doubt when he tells us that the companions of El, or Il, who is Kronos, the same as Saturn, were called Eloim or Kronians, and were said to be the equals of Kronos. Now, Kronos or Saturn, it is well known, was the emblem of time measured by the planets; his equals were therefore natural geni of the same species. The letter "H" being wanting in the Greek alphabet, the word expresses as nearly as possible the Phœnician—Arab Elohim, the Hebrew plural of Elah—god. But why is the organization or creation of the world attributed to these gods or geni? For the very simple and natural reason that the heavens and the earth to the ancients meant the great orb or circle included in the circle of the zodiac. The death of vegetation in the winter was believed by the ancients to be a real death, and as after the vernal equinox the spring vegetation recovered new life, the ancients believed this sudden appearance of leaf and flower and vegetable to be a real creation, and the creators and authors of all this stir of life were the geni or gods presiding over each sign of the zodiac.

The beginning, then, of which the Bible speaks would be the spring equinox, and at this time the sun enters the zodiacal sign of Aries the Ram. It is the sun and Aries which begin this creation, and it thus becomes plain why the plural form, Elohim, is used instead of the singular Eloah or Eljah.

We can obtain further proof of this by analyzing the word in the singular. It is composed of al and jah. The root el is contracted from the verb ail, meaning to roll or twist, and was hence applied as a name to the males of the sheep kind in allusion to their contorted or twisted horns. Jah means literally "he will be." We have, then, the assertion "he will be with twisted horns," that is, the sun will be in Aries, the sign of the ram, and the creation of the vegetation of another year will begin.

It is difficult for modern people, unless they give the subject considerable study, to comprehend how intimately all ancient religion was connected with the phenomena of the seasons and the aspect of the heavens at the important changes of the seasons. We can with difficulty comprehend the solicitude with which the ancients observed the northern and southern progress of the sun. Not until the coming of Mohammedanism with its uncompromising monotheism was this system overthrown in the orient. This influence forcibly garbled the series of astro-theological treatises we now call the Bible into a monotheism in which the old rational and beautiful meaning of these writings is lost and replaced by a senseless and meaningless account of the actions and commands of this tyrannical God of the Hebrews.

The creation to which the Bible in reality refers is nothing more than the new production, the spontaneous motion which every year in spring takes place in all the systems of vegetables and animals. This spring, the season of leaves, of flowers, and pastures of abundance, light and heat, was the golden age, as being under the influence of the sun, whose emblem in alchemy and astrology is gold.

The rendering of the first lines of Genesis from the Hebrew into English made by the writer styling himself Moreh Nebuchim seems to me neither conclusively nor satisfactory. For instance, he translates Boro as "he created," which is a mistranslation. The word never meant the production of something out of nothing; its primary sense is to cut, to divide. It is used in that sense in Joshua xvii, 15, in speaking of cutting down trees.

Max Muller says that the custom of translating the word as meaning created is of modern origin, and that to find out how the words of the Old Testament were understood by those to whom they were originally addressed is a task attempted by very few interpreters of the Bible. He shows that in Psalm civ, 30, the word bears the sense, "thou renewest the face of the earth." Now this is just what the Elohim do every spring, hence the first line of Genesis should read, "In the beginning the Gods [sun in Aries] divided the summer from the winter, renewing the face of the earth."

Next we have a translation of the Hebrew, "And the earth was without form and void." This, correctly translated, would read, "The earth in winter is dreary and desolate;" that is, bloody, in the old sense of the word, in allusion to the color of the dead vegetation at this season; desolate because of the obliquity of the sun's ray as opposed to the more direct rays of the summer sun.

Next we have in Genesis, "And the gods said, Let there be light, and there was light;" that is, the sun entering Aries at the spring equinox brought summer or light out of darkness and winter; winter passed, summer came.

That the view of the Bible herein set forth is the correct one finds some curious support in the conclusions reached by Sayce in the volume recently published by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, entitled "The Higher Criticism and the Verdict of the Monuments." The society for whom it was prepared evidently print it with regret, as they preface it with a statement of disapprobation. It is a book which brings dismay to those who have anxiously awaited it, for Sayce, to his everlasting honor, is an honest man for a churchman, and will not stretch the truth to the breaking-point. The result, instead of being such a consummation of their hopes as the dogmatists have prayed for, is distinctly a surrender of all the supernatural claims made for the origin of the Bible. It shows that the Biblical narratives of the Old Testament are fragments out of the wreck of a vast literature, which extended over the ancient oriental world from a remote epoch, and that we cannot understand them aright except in the light of the contemporary literature of which they formed a part.

Hebrew literature, then, is not isolated, requiring extraordinary or unusual causes to explain its origin, but must, in the nature of the case, partake of the same astrological character as the other literature of the orient. We have been misled by those who have found it to their interest to mis-translate the Biblical literature, and transform a distinctively astro-theological literature into a system of writings strictly monotheistic in character.

That these writings were astro-theological in their original meaning is well-nigh certain. All attempts to find evidence to support their historical character have failed, and whatever else these stories may be, we may feel sure that they are not history.

We have here, then, a garbled Semitic mythology distorted into a system of monotheism, but in its real character it is precisely the same as the Aryan mythology. Its characters are all solar heroes, masquerading under a thin historic disguise, but not a sufficiently complete or well-constructed one to deceive for an instant the eye of the scholar.

MORRIS M. BOSTWICK.

God or No God.

NAT. MILITARY HOME, D. V. S., CAL.,
May 9, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: God or no God—which? That is the question. If there be one he is either the author of all things or of nothing. Both ideas are suicidal. If the author of all things, then he is the author of all evil, both natural and moral. If so, it at once disproves the existence of a good God, and there can be no other. A tree is supposed to be known by its fruit, and like invariably produces or begets like. Hence the very fact that evil exists proves the non-existence of a God. Now which horn of the dilemma must we take? Either will eviscerate our vitals, based on the God idea, and the idea is suicidal from the very nature of things and the inexorable logic of facts.

We might quote proof texts by the score from the scriptures, but we are now reasoning from analogy and comparison, from whence all knowledge is gained, and not from many doubtful hypothesis or book of authority. Truths and facts are stubborn things, and will constantly be staring us in the face, whether we wish it or not. Truth is something that exists the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, and can never change or die. A fact is something that is done or has transpired. So it is not true there is a God, from the fact that we have no evidence of his existence, but quite the contrary. A desire and wish can not be made factors of facts. Neither can faith make a truth, nor prayer a fact. Nothing can change the laws of nature; we can merely manipulate environment, circumstances, and opportunities. "Nature does wrong never, 'tis society that sins." Nature is not conscious, intelligent, nor progressive—therefore, not responsible. Man being a conscious, intelligent, progressive, automatic being, sins, and is responsible. Sin comes from man's imperfection and moral evil. God cannot sin, for he does not exist. But theologians have it, when good it is God's; when evil, the devil's or man's by the intervening of that diabolical invention of priests, the doctrine of "free moral agency," which, by the way, is neither taught nor even mentioned in the Bible, for it would ignore all power of a God, who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will, seeing the end from the beginning, and being omniscient, omnipresent, and omnipotent, with love, mercy, and goodness as a heavenly father in addition. Free, moral agency, indeed! God or no God that is the most disintegrating and absurd doctrine that has disgraced the annals of the moral teachings of the world, and as destructive as oxygen, the most destructive of all agents.

Who in their senses would think of comprehending the end of the universe or of eternity? Absolutely there is no first or last. A first cause is out of the question. Nothing but an endless concatenation of causes and effects throughout the vast blue abyss of the universe. God, from good, is simply the personification of all goodness; so the devil from evil, the personification of evil; used as convenient terms that the imagination may yield readily to the understanding, as many other things are personified to children and the ignorant; as Santa Claus, Uncle Sam, John Bull, death, time, etc. The creation theory is totally wiped out by the doctrine of evolution, which is much more reasonable and comprehensive, and it has developed the truth that there is no need of a God. The eternity of nature and matter always evolving, and power inherent in matter—for no matter, no power—renders a deity totally unnecessary and superfluous, for there is nothing above nature or outside of nature. Supernaturalism is but an ignis-fatuus, emanating from a dis-tempered brain or ignorance. God has been a great excuse for ignorance and want of progression. Investigation goes no farther than to a God as the cause of all things, and to get rid of evil without implicating God has been the source of a constant war of theories and persecutions for ages. Hence free moral agency was invented to put the blame on man.

I argue not from a wish that there is no God, but I cannot stultify my reason and common sense by ignoring facts and experience. For how rejoiced would I be that there was a God, a kind, loving, heavenly father, who would answer our prayers, and even give us better than we could ask and without asking.

How can any reasonable person think that the purported perfect God, with his perfect law, created countless millions of poor, miserable, suffering, imperfect creatures such as we are, forcing them into this troublous world, and through it and out of it, with no consent of their own? Surely there cannot be a God, or such things would not be. How foolish all their doctrines of theology! Indeed, they are positively wicked and diabolical, and a stupendous stigma of opprobrium to a being of love and kindness, to say nothing of his power. J. D. McCLURE.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Japanese Lullaby.

Sleep, little pigeon, and fold your wings—
Little blue pigeon with velvet eyes;
Sleep to the singing of mother-bird swinging—
Swinging the nest where her little one lies.

Away out yonder I see a star—
Silvery star with a tinkling song;
To the soft dew falling I here it calling—
Calling and tinkling the night along.

In through the window a moonbeam comes—
Little gold moonbeam with misty wings;
All silently creeping, it asks: "Is he sleeping—
Sleeping and dreaming while mother sings?"

Up from the sea there floats the sob
Of the waves that are breaking upon the shore,
As though they were groaning in anguish and moaning—

Bemoaning the ship that shall come no more.

But sleep, little pigeon, and fold your wings—
Little blue pigeon with mournful eyes,
Am I not singing? See, I am swinging—
Swinging the nest where my darling lies.

Patriotic Sunday-schools.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I was recently at a meeting got up to organize a branch of the Society of Children of the American Revolution. It was very interesting to see the little ones march about carrying the star-spangled banner and singing patriotic songs. I understand that the society is to take in boys and girls up to the age of eighteen, and that the older ones are to study the history of the United States. The younger ones, I hope, will not be expected to do much more than become familiar with stories like Hawthorne's, and poems like Longfellow's about Paul Revere.

Allow me to suggest that you might get up something of this sort for the benefit of those children who do not go to Sunday-schools. There must be many little boys and girls who would like to see more of their playmates on that day; and parents must often find it hard to decide whether to let their children have the sociability of Sunday-school, or make them regret not being permitted. It seems to me that children who are not allowed to go to Sunday-school, ought to have something else equally interesting, as well as much more instructive. I am sure that if you will take the lead in organizing Sunday-schools of patriotism, you will do an incalculable benefit to the Liberal cause.

It might be well to have some instruction given at these schools in ethics, and also in physiology, botany, drawing, and other useful branches. What seems to me especially important is that the School of Patriotism should be managed in such a broad and genial spirit as to attract children from families of all shades of opinion, however Catholic or Protestant. It should not be a branch of the American Protective Association, or of any other aggressive association. However much you and I may think it our duty to do against superstition and bigotry, I think we can afford to let these children wait. Let us make them as patriotic and friendly to science as possible, and get as many of them as we can together for that purpose.

In order to make the new school a large one, it should not be limited, like the society already mentioned, to boys and girls whose great-great-grandfathers served in the Revolutionary War. It would be difficult to get enough such children together anywhere out of New England; and nothing would be more injurious to the public spirit of little boys and girls than to make them say to each other, "My grandfather was one of the heroes of the Revolutionary War, and yours wasn't!"

The principle of giving people special privileges on account of their ancestors is not American, but mediæval. It is the same delusion which curses Great Britain with a body of hereditary legislators, who sit in Parliament because their grandfathers did, and who seem in many cases to have had their opinions come down with their titles from the Dark Ages. If we want to make a boy truly American, we must treat him according to what he is himself, without regard to what his ancestors were more than a hundred years ago. Our School of Patriotism should be thoroughly republican and democratic. It should take care to have the elder children understand how much was done for our National Independence by foreigners like Paine and Lafayette. Its doors should stand open to all children in America, without regard to ancestry, race, color, religious affiliation, or place of birth. It might be well to have adult classes also, but the people most to be considered are the children. Respectfully yours,

F. M. HOLLAND.

[We agree with our friend Holland in regard to the establishment of patriotic Sunday-schools. It makes no difference whether a child's great, great, great-grandfather fought in the American Revolution or not. Love of country should be engrafted upon the mind of every child in the land, and there is no better way to do it than to study the history of the past and the deeds of those who established liberty on our native soil. We can learn easier, and perhaps more, by association in classes, and it might be well to organize classes for older people as well as the young, selecting one among the members for a reader or teacher. It would be wise, also, to vary the exercises with questions and occasional biographical essays. As to books, the teacher can readily select a suitable book from the large number of histories and sketch-books by modern authors, and will use that which may be close at hand rather than incur extra expense in purchasing new ones. It is with regret that we have to say that the name of one who contributed largely to the achievement of our liberties will not be found in our common school-books. We refer to one who has been aptly named "The Author-Hero of the Revolution"—one of the truest and noblest among patriots—Thomas Paine. The history of this noble man and the story of his memorable contributions to the cause of Freedom must be sought elsewhere. But in no wise must his labors be overlooked, for no other name has such bearing upon the blessings we now enjoy, or calls for greater gratitude than his. Let us hope our Liberal friends everywhere will lose no time in bringing their children together as suggested by Mr. Holland.—Ed. C. C.]

What A Woman Can Do.

I want my lady friends to know of the new field now open for them. In the past six months we have made a profit of 997.92 after paying all expenses. All our sales have been made at home, not having canvassed any. My official duties calling me away most of the time. I left the Dish Washer Business in my wife's control with the above results. The business is rapidly increasing, and will continue to grow until every family has a Climax Dish Washer. Not a day passes but what we sell one or two, and some days fifteen or twenty Dish Washers. It's easy selling what everybody wants to buy. You can wash and dry the dishes perfectly in two minutes. For full particulars, address the Climax Mfg. Co., Columbus, Ohio. Get a sample washer and you can't help but make money. They only cost $5. You may just as well be making $5 a day as to be doing nothing.

EDITORIAL

From the Freethought Magazine.

"The advertisement of that well-known Freethinker and distinguished jeweler, Otto Wettstein, appears in our advertising pages. Mr. Wettstein is worthy of the patronage of the public. He is an honest man that can be trusted. Whatever he agrees to give you you are sure to get, as we have learned by experience. Brother Wettstein is doing grand, good work for the cause of Freethought, and is entitled to the consideration of the Liberal public."

The subject of the above eulogy claims no credit as a writer or scholar; his efforts in that line are crude, and simply the "Musings" of his few idle hours. But he does claim to be a first-class jeweler. Has worked at the bench for forty-five years; is a natural mechanic, art critic, acute judge of goods, close buyer, and does business on minimum degree of expense. His FREE-THOUGHT BADGE is conceded to be the most artistic and expressive emblem ever designed. His "OTTO WETTSTEIN" WATCH combines all the qualities of a first-class timekeeper at one-half the usual rates, and his COLONEL INGERSOLL SOUVENIR SPOON is without question, the finest specimen of the die cutter's art ever produced. It is his aim now to establish himself as YOUR JEWELER.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. A TALE OF A HALO. By Morgan A. Robertson. Illustrated by A. Carey K. Jurist. Price, cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents. Truth Seeker Company, publishers.

The book is, generally speaking, a satire on heaven—a story in verse of Beelzebub's expedition to the heavenly city, and of the jealousy of the saints. It is lively and vivid in style, with a vein of good humor running through the whole, and would make even an orthodox laugh. It blends the sublime with the ridiculous to a nicety, which the most fastidious in literary culture could appreciate. It makes even the grotesque, which it an important feature in the narrative, appear classical. It is a good book to relieve one of religious dyspepsia.—Light of Truth.

"A Tale of a Halo" is a sort of Infernal Comedy, that is frequently clever, and seldom falls short of being amusing. The author wields a sporty, flippant pen; his jokes are, occasionally, devilish, and there is enough of bitter earnestness in his jests. The work is profusely and cleverly illustrated with marginal sketches.—Agnostic Journal.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE. A historical account of the status of women through the Christian ages; with reminiscences of the matriarchate. By Matilda Joselyn Gage. Crown octavo, 554 pages; cloth, gilt top, $2; half leather, $3. Address The Truth Seeker Company.

I have only lately come into possession of Mrs. Joselyn Gage's wonderful book, "Woman, Church, and State," and I am so carried away with it, so impressed by its powerful arraignment of the church as the oppressor of woman, I feel I must do a little toward bringing before the Liberals the immense value of this volume as an engine of destruction which shall curtail and cut off forever the usurped power and influence of all priests and all churches.

I do not think any other book that has ever been published has given anything like the amount of real information on this subject that this one does.

We all know of woman's wrongs, but the great volume of them and the depth to which they sank our sex has never before been so plainly, tersely, and emphatically set forth.

The bravest battle that ever was fought; Shall I tell you where and when? On the maps of the world you will find it not,

'Twas fought by the mothers of men.

Nay, not with cannon or battle shot,
With sword or nobler pen;
Nay, not with eloquent word or thought
From mouths of wonderful men.

But deep in a walled-up woman's heart—
Of woman that would not yield,
But bravely, silently bore her part—
Lo! there is that battle field.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of special interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures. This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

REV. MR. SMITHKINS: "Miss Alice, I regret to hear that you have been keeping up your euchar parties during Lent." Miss Alice: "Oh, but, dear rector, we have given away the loveliest little prayer-books for presents." —Exchange.

THE young minister in the country, whose parishioners were a little dilatory in salary paying, had emphasized two things in the morning prayer, viz., that the Lord would lead the good people to give him money, and that the Lord would help him to lead a good life. When he arose from prayer his five-year-old son assailed him with the profound question: "Papa, which would you rather the Lord would do, give you the money or help you to be good?" "Why," replied the faithful man, "I should rather he would help me to be good. Shouldn't you?" "I—I—if the Lord would give me money, perhaps I could be good all by myself, without his helping me," was the sober reply.

A LADY in Washington has two little daughters about five and ten years old respectively, and it has been the duty of the elder to see that the younger said her prayers every night. One morning not long ago the ten-year-old approached her mother in evident perturbation and announced that she didn't know what would become of Annie if she continued to address the throne in the way she did. The mother was naturally anxious and inquired what the young lady was doing that caused her pious meditations to be thus criticised. "O mamma," said the distressed child, "she runs on so when she says her prayers. She just says anything that comes in her head. Now, last night, after she had said, 'Now I lay me down to sleep,' and prayed for you and papa and all of us and grandma and Aunt Tiny, and everybody, she said, 'And please, dear Lord, take good care of yourself, because if anything should happen to you, we'd all go to pieces.'"

THE PARROT AND PASTOR. — AN EASTER SUNDAY EPISODE.

Perchance you may have heard before, If so, pray kindly hear once more About one naughty Polly. The story often has been told, To please alike the young and old, — And picture human folly. With little change we'll try this time To roast the chestnut into rhyme.

In sea-girt village near the shore, Where white-caps foam and breakers roar, While ships sail on the ocean, Each Sunday morn good Parson Murch Would hold a service in the church, And preach with deep devotion, In language strong as words can tell, The bliss of heaven and woes of hell.

It happened once on Easter day A great crowd went to see or pray, And hear his pious teaching. The choir sang, Murch read the psalm Which says the wicked God will damn, And took that text for preaching, When down the aisle a parrot flew And perched upon the pastor's pew.

This polly proved an ugly bird, Loved to repeat all slang she heard, Would swear just like a showman. With wicked sailors on the main She had been taught to speak profane. It seemed a dreadful omen That she should come in such a way, And use coarse words on Easter day.

The prayer and choir service done, Good Parson Murch had just begun To preach about salvation, And warn all sinners to repent, If not they surely would be sent To hades and damnation, The word "damn" reached the parrot's ear

When it at once began to swear.

Up on the pulpit then it flew And to the parson said "damn you!" Three times right out in meeting. The like was never heard before, The preacher started for the door; "Damn you," Poll kept repeating, To deacons, members, everyone, As down the aisle in haste they run.

One lame old lady, nearly blind, When all rushed out was left behind, The bird flew on her shoulder, Repeating as it lit, "damn you!" Quick as a flash she turned and threw Poll on the floor, and told her, "Damn members, deacons all, and Murch, Damn them, I don't belong to church." —B. M. Lawrence.

EPIDEMIC DELUSIONS. A Lecture by Frederic R. Marvin, M.D. Giving reasonable reasons for Religious and other Delusions.

FALSE CLAIMS OF THE CHURCH. John E. Remsburg's most noted work, and one of the most effective ever written by any Freethinker.

FIRST EPISTLE OF BENNETT THE APOSTLE TO THE TRUTH SEEKERS. Written while journeying in and near the land of Yahweh. Containing the best moral instructions of the world from the great teachers of the former ages. D. M. Bennett.

THE GIANT DELUSION. A paper read before the Freethought International Congress at Chicago. One of Otto Wettstein's fraternal attacks on Spiritualism.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY. To which is added a poem on Thomas Paine. One of Samuel P. Putnam's most brilliant lectures. Every Christian who asks the idiotic question, "What Has Infidelity Done?" should be induced to read this book, if he has to be paid to do it.

HOW CAN WE BE SAVED? Was Jesus Supernaturally Conceived, and did he Rise from the Dead? Israel W. Groh.

INGERSOLL AND JESUS. Showing how the two agree. A poem by Samuel P. Putnam.

THE LIMITATIONS OF TOLERATION. A discussion between Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic R. Conder, Ex-Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, before the Nineteenth Century Club of New York. "Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him." Colonel Ingersoll maintains this, the others deny it. Mr. Conder is a Roman Catholic, Mr. Woodford a Protestant.

MATERIALISM: Its History, and Its Influence Upon Society. Dr. Louis Buchner.

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE WORKERS. A Consideration of the Marvels and Miracles of the New Testament. One of John Peck's best books.

MOSES BEFORE THE COURT, or The Forgery of the Old Testament. Dedicated to the Clergy. H. J. Seignuret, M.D.

THE NEW GOD. "It is an open secret that man has always made his Gods. They exist in and through him, as the image exists in and through the mirror. Take away man and you take away God—the image vanishes." This pamphlet, therefore, is a consideration of what kind of a God man should make. Samuel P. Putnam.

ORTHODOXY. A lecture by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and one of that great man's best. The subjects considered are: Orthodox Religion Dying Out, Religious Deaths and Births, The Religion of Reciprocity, Mohammed, The Destruction of Art, The Discovery of America, Copernicus and Kepler, Charles Darwin, Special Providence, The Latest Creed, God as a Governor, The Love of God, The Fall of Man, The Atonement, The Second Birth, Inspiration, The Reign of Truth and Love, The Wars It Brought, The Resurrection, The Judgment Day, Pious Evasions, "No Bible, No Civilization," Miracles of the New Testament, The Ascension, Casting out Devils, Necessity of Belief, Eternal Punishment, Some Who Are Damned, What I Believe, Immortality. This lecture is on the famous text, "The Clergy know that I know that they do not know."

PERSONAL EXISTENCE AFTER DEATH IMPROBABLE. L. R. Smith.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS MASS MEETING AT LINCOLN HALL, WASHINGTON. Being the Speeches of Hon. FREDERICK DOUGLASS and Col. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL, on the Decision of the United States Court that the Civil Rights Act is Unconstitutional. Fifty-three large octavo pages, of which Colonel Ingersoll's speech occupies 38 pages.

PULPIT, PEW, AND CRADLE. So long as the Pulpit speaks to believing Pews composed chiefly of mothers, the cradle will be rocked by ghosts and the race will remain on its knees to a devil of its own creation and to a God who is powerless against him. One of Helen Gardner's brightest efforts.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY BETTER THAN ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. M. Babcock.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS. One of L. K. Washburn's best lectures, and it is, like all of his, very good.

THE ROARING LION ON THE TRACK. One of M. Babcock's comical sermons.

SCIENCE vs. RELIGION, or The Conflict Between Reason and Superstition. T. O. Widdicombe.

ST. MATTHEW BEFORE THE COURT. Presenting the evidence of the forgery of his alleged gospel. H. J. Seignuret.

Containing the famous Christmas Sermon by Colonel Ingersoll, the protests thereby evoked from the ministers who think they own this country and all therein, and Colonel Ingersoll's replies to the same. A finely gotten up pamphlet. Price, 25 cents.

Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

LINCOLN

This is Colonel INGERSOLL's great lecture, printed in a handsome pamphlet, and containing the Century's famous portrait of Lincoln—said to be the best extant. Price, 25 cents.

PIANOS, PIANOS!

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STROCK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

Gems of Thought.

ONLY by varied iteration can alien conceptions be forced on reluctant minds.—Herbert Spencer.

LOVE is never immoral; hate is never moral. Love is the mother of all virtues; hatred is the father of all crimes and vices.—Lucy A. Mallory.

"THE right of free speech shall not be abridged." We contend for that right today. No individual should be debarred from expressing his opinion. He may stand alone. No other may agree with him. The greater the reason he should be heard. He alone in all the world may have the truth. He may be a Newton, a Franklin, a Stephenson, or a Watt in possession of some sublime fact for the people.—Mattie A. Freeman.

THE aloofness of writers of books, who imagine that the affairs which to the mass of men introduce the issue of life and death can have no part in what become the fancies and fripperies of literary creation, is abhorrent to all master-craftsmen. It is of the first importance that a writer should have something to say, and that his message should mix in the blood that beats in the public pulse. Other things can be spared if this be secured. Great ideas mold utterance to the grandeur of their own beauty.—Horace L. Traubel.

SOME talk of the rashness of the uneducated classes. Alas! ignorance is far oftener obstinate than rash. Against one French Revolution—that scarecrow of the ages—weigh Asia, "carved in stone," and a thousand years of Europe, with her half dozen nations mated out and trodden down to be the dull and contented footstools of priests and kings. The customs of a thousand years ago are the sheet-anchor of the passing generation, so deeply buried, so fixed, that the most violent efforts of the maddest fanatic can drag it but a hand's-breadth.—Wendell Phillips.

DID it ever occur to you that, instead of combining to "crush" the social outcasts, or the "evil," if you please, it would be wiser and nobler to search out how to prepare future fathers and mothers for the proper fulfilment of nature's laws? Did it ever occur to you that the preventing grace, which is better than all conceivable cures, must be found in imparting to the just born the right knowledge of that nature which they inherit to their otherwise undoing, and the right use of its subtle powers? You will never even lessen prostitution until you do this.—Louise Tressotte.

A "WHY" for the moral life, in the sense of an ulterior motive other than that life itself, there cannot be. The attempt to erect one at once destroys the conception of morality, whose essence lies in the objects of will. The only sense in which, if I am right, a "why" for the moral life can be assigned, is that of an explanation, not the indication of an ulterior motive. The explanation must take the form of showing that at bottom, or in so far as contradictions are removed, the moral will is our will—that is to say, a normal human will. Granting the will to live a human life at all, morality comes by completeness and consistency in purpose and achievement.—B. Bosanquet.

ON Sunday, the 21st of November, 1694, a babe was born—a babe so exceedingly frail that the breath hesitated about remaining, and the parents had him baptized as soon as possible. They were anxious to save the soul of this babe, and they knew that if death came before baptism the child would be doomed to an eternity of pain. They knew that God despised an unsprinkled child. The priest, who, with a few drops of water, gave the name of Francois-Marie Arouet, to this babe and saved his soul, little thought that before him, wrapped in many folds, weakly wailing, scarcely breathing, was the one destined to tear from the white throat of Liberty the cruel, murderous claws of the "Triumphant Beast."—Ingersoll.

THE carnivorous instinct with which God has endowed large classes of animals suggests the opposit of benevolence in the creator. But, almost as if to furnish palpable proof of his cruelty, it is not enough that other creatures must be killed and eaten by such beasts, he has provided also that their suspense and terror shall be prolonged to furnish sport to them. But St. George Mivart might tell us, perhaps, that the mouse which puss suffers to creep away, to a certain distance, while she lies with half-closed eyes, or is looking another way, pretending not to know what is going on, does not really wish to escape. He is only playing, too. He enjoys the antepandrial gambols as much as the cat does. Certainly this kind of discourse would be of the same tenor as what he has written of the sufferings of animals under certain conditions.—John Francis Smith.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations; and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

A small farm of 10 acres 86 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water, good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes walk of the railroad station, 9 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes walk.

The place is specially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1.00 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

ODE TO THOMAS PAINE.

WORDS BY GEO. E. MACDONALD

MUSIC BY J. R. MACDONALD

Men have fought for home and coun-try, They have died for na-tive land,
 And the lus-tre of song.... or of sto-ry
 Shall for-ev-er grow the bright-er, While the na-tion yet shall stand
 When it speaks to the heart..... of their glo-ry
 We may sing the dirge of sor-row For the com-rade dead so long, On his pil-low of dust..... he is ly-ing
 But will hear a note tri-um-phant in the cho-rus of our song For the cause that was won by his dy-ing
 REFRAIN.
 Sing, then of free-dom For mind and for hand She ev-'ry bond shall dis-sev-er The wind up-on the moun-tain the waves up-on the strand, Sing lib-er-ty's cho-rus for-ev-er.

In the front of Freedom's army, 'mid the darkness of the night,
 Should her false friends mislead or betray her,
 There is one heroic spirit, to her feet a guiding light,
 A defense from the foe who would slay her.
 Soldier, author, sage, and prophet, lo! he has not lived in vain,
 Where the warfare of liberty wages
 We shall see his lofty figure and shall know that Thomas Paine
 Will be heard in the voice of the ages.

REFRAIN—

Pledge we their union, Freedom and Paine,
 Union that time cannot sever;
 The chorus of the valleys, the music of the plain,
 Shall swell to their triumph forever.

Let the drum be heard no longer, let the flag of war be furled,
 Let the rod of the master be broken,
 And the name of him we honor that his country was the world
 By the voices of millions be spoken.
 We may rear a stone the proudest that has ever kissed the sky—
 It shall crumble though nations may cherish—
 'Tis the mighty inspirations that were never born to die,
 And the victories won cannot perish.

REFRAIN—

Raise, then, the anthem, sing it again,
 Freedom each bond shall dis sever,
 The music of the mountain, the valley and the plain
 Is Liberty's chorus forever.

DURING the past week many more manufacturing concerns have advanced the wages of their workmen, while others have announced the resumption of full-time work.

MARTINEZ CAMPOS, commander-in-chief of the Spanish forces in Cuba, issued an order that all newspaper correspondents going into the insurgent lines for news be shot on their return.

THE great composer, Francesco Ezechiele Ermenegildo Cavalliere Suppe Demelli, usually known as Franz von Suppe, died in Vienna on May 21. He was born in Spalato, Dalmatia, in 1820.

THE town fathers of Orange Valley, N. J., have adopted an ordinance imposing a fine of $10 on any person appearing in the street in a dress not "belonging to his or her sex." This is supposed to be aimed at the health bicycle suits.

A SOUTHERN Business men's financial convention began in Memphis on May 23d. Secretary of the Treasury Carlisle made the opening address. He represented the views of the administration on the silver issue, and his references to President Cleveland were received with great applause. Immediately after the close of the convention Congressman Bryan of Nebraska replied to the speech of Secretary Carlisle. A counteracting free silver convention will be held soon in Memphis.

GOVERNOR MORTON, of New York, has appointed commissioners to confer with the governor of New Jersey with reference to the preservation of the Palisades of the Hudson by having the United States take them for a public park and reservation.

THE parliamentary elections which were held throughout Italy on Sunday, May 26, resulted in a pronounced ministerial victory. All the cabinet ministers were reelected, Crispi being returned from several districts, as also was Barbado, the Socialist leader. The Socialists gained a number of seats.

THE recent earthquakes destroyed seven villages in the southwest portion of Epirus, Albania. Fifty were killed and 150 injured in Paramythia. In Florence, Italy, scarcely a house escaped damage. It is estimated that one night four thousand carriages were used as refuges for Florentine women.

THE monument to the Confederate dead of North Carolina was unveiled at Raleigh on May 20. It is built of granite quarried in the state, and is seventy-three feet in height. The grandchild of Stonewall Jackson, Julia Jackson Christian, eight years of age, pulled the cord that stripped the monument of its drapery.

THE Young Men's Democratic Club of Massachusetts declares for the equal intrinsic value of all coins issued by the government, and demands that they be legal tender; that the government shall withdraw from the banking business and retire its legal tender notes, all paper money to be issued by banks.

INSPECTOR WILLIAMS and Chief Byrnes are no longer on the New York police force. Both have been retired on pensions, on their own applications. It was for them the choice between voluntary retirement and a bitter struggle with the new Board of Police Commissioners to retain their places, with defeat certain at the end.

ADMIRAL KIRKLAND, commanding the United squadron in European waters, reports that the Armenian outrages have been greatly exaggerated. He is emphatic in his exoneration of the Sultan from blame in these troubles, and his view is concurred in by all the diplomatic representatives of this country whom he met in that section of the world.

ALL parties in Cuba demand home rule, and General Campos, finding the insurrection so much stronger than he had supposed it to be when he first reached the island and announced that all reforms must wait until order was restored, is now promising the chiefs of the Autonomist and Reform parties that he will at once set about putting into effect the reform measures passed by the Spanish Cortes some time ago. He has found that the refusal of Spain to institute reform has greatly strengthened the revolutionary party.

ALL opposed to vaccination, or its compulsion by law directly or indirectly, are invited to attend a convention at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York city, at 2 P. M., June 5, 1895, for the purpose of forming a National Anti-Compulsory Vaccination League. The signers of the call for the convention declare that "it is not true that vaccination protects from or mitigates small pox; it is not true that the inoculated cow-pox is an innocent disease." Appended to the call are the signatures of some more than fifty men and women, including about thirty physicians.

EX-UNITED STATES CONSUL WALLER, sentenced by a French court martial in Madagascar to twenty years penal servitude on the charge of having given information to the Hovas concerning the movements of the French invaders, but really, in all probability, because he had secured valuable rubber concessions from the native government, and who was removed to France to serve his term in a military prison, has had his case, on the representations of the United States government, transferred to the civil jurisdiction, and will likely have a new trial. He may receive indemnity for the damages he has sustained.

SECRETARY OF STATE WALTER Q. GRESHAM died at his home in Washington at 1:15 A. M., May 28. He had been very sick for some time and, in fact, never really well since he received the wound at Leggett's Hill, which took him off the field for a year. Mr. Gresham's family physician was Dr. Henry Krogstad, homeopathist. On May 4 Mrs. Gresham told him that she wished to call another physician in consultation. Dr. Krogstad acquiesced, and Dr. W. W. Johnston, allopathist, was called, but he refused to consult with Dr. Krogstad, whereupon the case was turned over to him. It is stated that he made no effort to ascertain the history of the case from his predecessor, and their diagnoses sharply diverge in some particulars.

AN OLD QUESTION ANSWERED.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them: we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS)

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

What a New Subscriber, Who Has Received His Pictorial Text-Book, Says of It.

LAMAR, MO., May 8, 1895.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is received, and after a careful examination of the work I unhesitatingly pronounce it one of the most impressive Freethought works ever issued from the press. It will indeed "corner the parson" and all his flock, and I shall take great pleasure in showing the book to my orthodox friends. As a reference book it is invaluable, and it should find a place in every Freethinker's library. Respectfully, W. F. BAILEY.

The Same Old Fallacies.

Rev. J. B. Remensnyder, pastor of the St. James Lutheran church, this city, said in a recent sermon:

"I do not favor the austere Puritan observance of Sunday. I believe the Sabbath was made for man, and that such Sunday recreation as does not conflict with the sentiment of reverence, while it affords pure air, health, and innocent pleasure to those denied them during the incessant toil of the week, should be not only allowed but encouraged. For this reason there is but one objection that can be offered to the opening of libraries and art museums on Sunday, and that is that it involves the loss to the employees of Sunday for their own rest and spiritual well-being."

We are of course glad to perceive these evidences of clerical liberality, but we cannot forbear to ask the minister why, if the Sabbath "was made for man," the priests have so long been permitted to monopolize it. There is no more point in saying that the Sabbath was made for man than there would be in saying that any or all of the other days of the week were made for him. The day is caused by the motions of the earth in relation to the sun, and would continue to be were there not a human being on the planet. If man is wise, he will make such use of Sunday, as of the other days—in reality there is only one kind of day with different names—as he may think best, guided by the experience of himself and his predecessors and entirely independent of all creeds and priest-codes. There is not the slightest occasion for inquiring whether any given form of recreation "conflicts with the spirit of reverence"—no more than there would be for asking whether Smith or Robinson performs his daily labor in a properly reverential spirit. It is a matter that concerns neither the minister nor the legislator. Invasions of the equal rights of the citizen are to be guarded against, that is all. The Sunday opening of libraries, museums, and theaters need not deprive any one of the rest he requires. He can rest on another day while those to whose comfort he contributes by his Sunday work are engaged in their regular labors. As to the possible detriment to his "spiritual well-being," resulting from his absence from the "house of God" on Sunday, it should not be necessary to remind Mr. Remensnyder, an expounder of "God's word," that the Bible represents Jesus, "the master," as saying: "When thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy father which is in secret, and thy father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly."

Noticing Mr. Remensnyder's "rest" argument, the New York Times remarks: "The same consideration for sextons and their assistants, organists, members of choirs, ushers, and even clergymen themselves, would prevent the opening of churches on that day no less than that of the other places."

Hopes of Sanguin Catholics.

Rev. Walter Elliott is a missionary of the Paulist Fathers, a Catholic order. He is very sanguine that America is to be finally converted to Catholicism. In a late number of the Catholic World, a magazine published by the Paulists, he gives some of the grounds for his rose-hued expectations. He is of the opinion that eventually Catholic priests and well-instructed Catholic laymen will form a missionary corps and bring the whole nation into the fold of the one true church. He emphatically declares that he and other priests are witnesses to the fact that Catholics can get a hearing from non-Catholics; they have tried the experiment, he says, and have succeeded. The matter is presented to his fellow churchmen in this manner:

"The condition of things is that the Catholic church in America is among the non-Catholic people who are willing to listen to Catholic truth. Stop at that fact and square your conscience to it. As layman, priest, or prelate, reckon with God thus: I am a member of the one true church, and I can get a hearing for its claims from non-Catholics. What should I do about it?"

The duty of the true Catholic, he affirms, is not confined to making converts outright; part of the work is "to remove bitterness, to set aside delusions, to overpower prejudices." If you cannot turn your heretical neighbors into Catholics, at least make them "good-natured Protestants." It is the Catholic's duty to do this. And it is good policy:

"If you can get a hearing, it may be that you cannot gain an immediate victory, but you can reduce the warfare to a friendly contest; you can put an end to polemical scalping. To establish our belligerent rights is half the battle. To secure a hearing for Catholicity, as one among the religious claimants, is an immense advantage."

Father Elliott is wise in his day and generation. This is not the time for bringing about the "unity" of the church by force. Old methods must be abandoned, at least temporarily. The Catholic church needs the Protestant auxiliaries, and the latter are powerless to preserve the family heritage without the assistance of the "Mother" church. To get Protestants, who have been taught to look upon the Pope as Antichrist and the Roman church as the "Scarlet Woman," to recognize the Catholic as one among the Christian denominations would indeed be "an immense advantage" to the hierarchy. Many thus brought face to face with the question of the relation of Catholicism to the Protestant bodies would be compelled to admit that she is indeed their mother, that she is the real Christian church, through whose agency alone come to them the Bible and all the dogmas of their common religion. If Christianity as a supernaturally revealed system of belief is to be preserved, it will be as the Catholic church.

Father Elliott says that to make converts outright two factors are needed—"God's secret inspiration" and the "piety and intelligence of Catholic friends and relatives." It would be safe to say that the latter will do the work, aided by other mundane influences, while the inspiration of God will be utilized for stage effects and get most of the applause. Right here we are told that both of these agencies can be profitably supplemented by "public lectures, which frequently are necessary adjuncts of inner grace and outer edification." God seems to need a great deal of help to bring his wandering sheep back into the corral. To say that public lectures frequently are "necessary" adjuncts of inner grace is equivalent to affirming that often God cannot reclaim the lost without the help of the priests who give the lectures. There is nothing like exalting one's own calling. In commenting on this part of Father Elliott's article it may be pertinent to inquire what he means when he says that the "piety and intelligence of Catholic friends and relatives" may be of assistance in converting Protestants. As the church steadily antagonizes mixed marriages, there surely cannot be many Catholics who have Protestant relatives, can there? Or does the priest allude to the relatives of Catholics who were once Protestants themselves? Of the latter class there are presumably a good many, especially in England. Reliable statistics of Protestant conversions to Catholicism would be very instructive at this time.

As to the attacking of Protestant doctrines by Catholic priests, Father Elliott would have none of it. He thinks that nothing in the way of controversy can equal "the direct statement of the truth by a man esteemed by his hearers for his virtues." This would avoid the vexations and the possible defeats of argumentation, but we should think that it would not always be possible for the missionary priest to appeal to a Protestant audience through his virtues, owing to the audience's lack of intimate acquaintance with him. It is all very well to depend upon the "direct statement of truth" if one is sure that he has the truth, but in discussing theological questions that is something that neither Protestant nor Catholic is likely to admit as possible in the case of the other. The argument of character is not worth very much so far as the truth of doctrines is concerned, or when the inspiration and authenticity of an ancient book is in question. The most virtuous of men may easily be grossly credulous, while a knave may be an excellent historical and literary critic. Then the appearance or the profession of moral rectitude does not invariably argue its possession.

When the Paulist priest asks, "Is there a Catholic church in the United States which has not Protestant money in it—not to mention our charitable and educational institutions?" he probably has in mind the money the church receives from the taxpayers through the exemption of its property from taxation. In the same way it receives the contributions of the Jew and the Freethinker, just as they both add to the revenues of the Protestant churches. But we hardly see the propriety of boasting of stealings as a bond of union, or of offering the fact as a recommendation of the Catholic church to inquiring Protestants, though as the Protestants are guilty of the same "virtue" they may not be insulted by the allusion. However, there can be no doubt that many business men of Protestant views voluntarily contribute liberally to the revenues of Rome, and we presume that Catholic advertisers give generously to the Protestant canvassers. We know that, unfortunately, disbelievers in the creeds of both branches of the Christian church give a great deal of money to them, for the sake of standing well with their adherents. If all money of Freethinkers thus worse than wasted were used where it should be used there would be no dearth of means to fight the schemes of the enemies of civil and religious liberty.

Father Elliott is opposed to sending missionaries to heathen countries while there is such a field ripe for the harvest in this country. We should say that he is clearly in the right, from the view-point of the church. No doubt it will be found much easier and cheaper to convert Protestants to Catholicism than it is to convert the adherents of Buddhism, Shintoism, or Mohammedanism to Christianity. The orthodox Protestant already believes in the Catholic Trinitarian God, in the Catholic's virgin-born savior, in the dogmas of the Creation, the Fall, the Curse, the Redemption, the Resurrection; in the devil and hell and heaven; in the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible. The few Catholic doctrines which the Protestants rejected—chiefly because they did not like the polity of the church of Rome—are logically parts of the Christian system, as thousands of thoughtful Protestants were compelled to concede when once they had laid aside their prejudices long enough to calmly examine the rival claims of the two divisions. Really logical minds cannot long feel at home in Protestantism in this age of criticism and science; it seems inevitable that the acute brains of the world—in so-called Christian lands—will turn back to Rome or go forward into Rationalism. There is no possible middle ground for such men and women.

Naturally we are not delighted by the prospect of large accessions to the Catholic church from the Protestant denominations—not that we regard the Protestants of this class as more sincerely devoted to the cause of equal freedom and social justice, but because we prefer that the enemies of the rights of man should waste their strength in fighting each other over minor differences. But it is probable that as the reactionary elements in the Protestant bodies go back to Rome the more progressive elements will hasten to us, in greater numbers than usual, and no doubt we shall also receive an increasingly large number of recruits from Rome herself. But of course all this is problematical, yet it is certain that Protestantism will lose to both Rome and Reason. Meanwhile the theocratic Protestants are playing directly into the hands of the Catholics.

Moses Harman Resentenced.

United States Judge John F. Phillips, of the Western district of Missouri, has just resentenced Moses Harman, editor of Lucifer, of Topeka, Kan., to one year's imprisonment at hard labor for the alleged offense of sending the Markland letter through the mails. By a letter received from Mr. Harman at the moment of going to press we learn that the venerable editor expected to be taken to the penitentiary at Lansing at 1 P.M. June 2d. Hon. David Overmyer, Mr. Harman's attorney, has until July 1st to file a bill of exceptions on which to base an appeal to a higher court. It had been expected that the much-persecuted reformer would not be taken to prison until the bill was filed, but Deputy Marshal Dillard notified him late in the afternoon of June 1st that he had orders to take him away at once. Overmyer will do all that he can to secure his early release.

"ALBANY, May 27.—Governor Morton to-day signed the bill doing away with the old 'blue law' prohibiting Sunday parades with music of any kind. The new law allows music to be played on Sunday at a military funeral and at the burial of a National Guardsman or of a deceased member of an association of veteran orders, or of a disbanded militia regiment, or of a secret fraternal society, while escorting the body, but not within one block of a place of worship where service is being conducted."—A Press Dispatch.

This is a short step in advance, but it has not been taken in recognition of any fundamental principle of right or liberty. It is merely a concession to the growing power of military and fraternal organizations. Or perhaps it is previsionary on the part of the church. The Sunday schools are rapidly being turned into military encampments and drilling grounds, and it is quite probable that some of the juvenile armies will one day desire to bury deceased members on Sunday with the "honors of war." Hence this law. At all events, it is very difficult to conceive of any law regarding Sunday getting into the statute books without the consent of the ecclesiastics. Even now somebody must die before the bands can play on Sunday. People must parade to funeral music or not at all. Gaiety and happiness on Sunday are still offenses against the law and sins in the eyes of God. This "Reform" enactment provides for the protection of the churches from disturbance, but nothing is said concerning not playing within a block of a hall or other place where a lecture is in progress. Why should not the lecturer have the same protection as the preacher? And why should theatrical entertainments, operas, and other indoor secular performances be outlawed? The people who attend church have no greater rights than those who do not, and deserve no special privileges.

The New York State Sabbath Association is still trying to spread the black cloud of its medieval ignorance and tyranny over the whole state. Its executive committee recently held its semi-annual meeting in this city, and its annual convention will be held in Rochester in October. Field Secretary Albro said that the Association is now considering a law to close all cigar and candy stores and fruit stands on Sunday. Think of all that that implies and involves! That any body of men should seriously propose and work for such a law is a cruel satire on the vaunted love of liberty and justice of the American people. What a record of mistakes, imbecility, and crime we must have made that the ministers of despotism should at this day be encouraged to press forward in such nefarious undertakings as this! That they should dare to even hint their desire for laws like this they now propose is a brand of shame upon the brows of us all, and it will never be effaced while a Sunday law remains upon the statute books of any state or of the nation.

"The unethical must die. It has no guarantee of immortality. The ethical, the godlike, alone is eternal."—Progressive Age.

Unethical from whose point of view? Man's? Very well, he will always in the future, as he has in the past, denounce as unethical whatever he thinks is inimical to his happiness, and as he grows wiser and obtains greater command over the forces of nature, he will be able to lessen the power of the unethical factors of existence. Especially in his relations with his fellows will he probably justify our hopes of great improvement. But to say that the unethical is doomed to disappear utterly is a waste of breath. Extreme heat, extreme cold, earthquakes, cyclones, the natural decay of our life forces, are all as unethical manward as are the theft, murder, torture, and tyranny through which men have made each other miserable. We can, to a certain extent, modify the action of these influences upon ourselves, but we are necessarily limited in knowledge and power, and hence it is folly to dream that any generation will be so fortunate as to be entirely freed from the effects of unethical nature outside of man, even should man himself become perfect, which it is impossible to believe that a finite being can ever do. When this planet has run its course of existence, as all cosmic bodies must, the unethical will score its final triumph over all forms of life hereon. We need not worry concerning that far-distant hour, but neither will it avail to dream dreams of impossible perfection. There is any amount of more rational work ready to our hands. When we say that the "godlike" alone is eternal we talk to the winds. What has one end has two, and certainly "the ethical, the god-like," has not to this date been in sole possession of the universe, else why the Progressive Age's strenuous endeavors to bring about a better condition of affairs? Let us be done with bombast and hifalutin.

The Christian Statesman complains that the daily papers of the state, and particularly those of Pittsburgh, have maintained complete silence respecting the three bills offered in the legislature of Pennsylvania and having for their object the modification of some features of the Sabbath laws. It says that their reporters were absent from the hearings when the Sabbatharians presented arguments against the bills and that their news columns were bare of information concerning the measures. It charges that their object is to get the bills through without attracting the attention of the people of the state, which may be all true and yet be perfectly justifiable. We think, however, that as a matter of expediency the papers could pursue a wiser course. The education of the masses cannot begin too soon, and the newspapers are the teachers that must do most of the work. But this is a matter of judgment and method and involves no ethical issue. If the newspaper men of the state have reason to believe that a majority of the people are still under the thumbs of the Sunday worshipers and that any ameliorative measures would be in greater danger of defeat if the questions at issue were publicly discussed than they would be if the matter were kept quiet, they are certainly doing the best thing possible under the circumstances. They might fairly reason that if the reform bills can be got through the legislature and be put into effect for a while the people will become accustomed to them and find that no evil effects follow their enactment. It should be distinctly understood by all that this fight against Sabbatarianism is a defensive battle, and that the rules of war must govern. Invaders need not expect to be the recipients of a daily bulletin of the contemplated movements of the defenders of liberty. War is not debate. The object of war is to inflict as much damage as possible upon the enemy at the least cost to ourselves. The Sunday tyrants have taken up the sword of legal violence, and it is childish and cowardly for them to complain that we do not tell them beforehand just how we are going to cut, thrust, and parry. They must get that information at their own expense. How we shall conduct the campaign is wholly a matter of expediency.

When Christianity gained strength in the cities and became the leading religion in the Roman empire the worship of the old gods was chiefly confined to the remote villages (pagi) and the scattered inhabitants of the country (pagani). Hence the word "pagan" to designate the non-Christian. There is now being segregated in this country a new "paganism," and it is composed of Christians, paradoxical as that may sound when first heard. We have often referred in these columns to the fact that the strongholds of Sabbatarianism and of other repressive measures of the church are the rural districts and small towns. The Christian Statesman appears to have made the discovery that this is certainly true in Pennsylvania. Referring to the vote in the legislature on the bill to reduce the fine for the violation of the Sunday law in Allegheny county from $25 to $4, to bring it down to that imposed in the rest of the state, the aforesaid organ of the National Reform Association says:

"One thing that is ready to break, if it has not already partly broken, is the bond of connection between the city members of the legislature and the members from the smaller towns and the country districts."

And considerably more to the same effect. The Statesman gives the names and post-office addresses of the members who voted for and against the bill just mentioned. We have analyzed the vote, and find the result quite interesting and instructive. In 1890 Pennsylvania had eight cities having each a population in excess of 30,000. In the order of their numerical superiority, they are: Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Allegheny, Scranton, Reading, Erie, Harrisburg, and Wilkes Barre. Forty-seven members of the legislature voted to reduce the fine in Allegheny county. Of these, thirty-one, or within a very small fraction of sixty-six per cent of the total affirmative vote, are from the cities named. Of the sixty-five who voted against the reduction of the fine, but four, or a small fraction over six per cent of the total negative vote, are from the eight leading cities of the state. Verily the aggressive Christianity of our day is a "pagan" religion. Here in New York we are governed from Albany by the votes of the rural legislators, manipulated by political bosses. The centers of the world's advance thought and enterprise are against the reactionists. Cosmopolitanism counts for light and liberty. The best missionaries that we can send to the Christian pagans of the country are the trolley cars, the bicycles, the Sunday newspapers, the artists, the circulating libraries. Destroy the pagans by enlightening them. Thus they will become citizens of the world.

BY THE GRAVE OF THOMAS PAINE

Second Annual Memorial Celebration at New Rochelle.

THE SERVICES OF A GREAT MAN RECALLED

Eloquent Addresses by Wakeman, Rowley, Warwick, Watters, and Others, and a Poem Read and Sung—Proposal to Surmount the Monument with a Bust of the Author-Hero—Many Freethinkers Picnic at the Paine Homestead.

The gentlemen who spoke at the Paine Memorial celebration at New Rochelle on Decoration Day referred often to the fact that the man whose virtues they commemorated was many years in advance of his time; it was even said that he was in advance of the present age. It was called to mind that Thomas Paine had been the first to advocate arbitration for the settlement of disputes between nations. Here, without doubt, Paine was far ahead of the popular sentiment of to-day. The saddest sight in New York on this thirtieth of May was the military display made by the children from the public schools and the Sunday-schools. Passing through the central part of the city in the forenoon one saw companies, regiments, brigades, and divisions of school boys marching to the sound of drum and fife. The older boys were uniformed and armed; the younger ones were simply in military order, dressed in their holiday attire, but all were animated by the murder spirit, trained in the art of wholesale slaughter. There was one brigade composed of four regiments from the Baptist Sunday-schools; the Ninth division was made up almost entirely of battalions from various Catholic churches, and Epworth Leaguers (Methodists); the Eleventh division included more Baptist boys, and cadets of various kinds, among them the boys' brigade of Bethany church and the St. Thomas Temperance Cadets, while in the "American Guard" were 11,000 boys from the public schools of the city. In all this lamentable display there was not one indication that the leaders in our political life have the slightest idea that the world is passing from the military to the industrial stage of civilization; that, as Herbert Spencer says, "social organization is to be considered high in proportion as it subserves individual welfare, because in a society the units are sentient and the aggregate insentient; and the industrial type is the higher because, in that state of permanent peace to which civilization is tending, it subserves individual welfare better than the military type." Here Spencer has put in philosophic phrase what Paine put in the language of the common people, but on the thirtieth of May here in New York and over the river in Brooklyn there was no visible evidence that our civil and military masters have come in contact with the idea in either form, or that they have even dreamed of it as possible that the civilization of the world is tending to the condition of permanent peace. In a word, in such civic displays as this of which we are speaking the factors of modern progress receive no public recognition whatever. It is savagery only that is praised, exalted, idealized. In all the sweltering ranks of the juvenile victims of our political and journalistic jingoism, our end-of-the-century fire eaters, there was not to be seen a symbol of the mental, moral, and industrial forces that lift this age above the barbarism of the distinctively war epochs. Who, passing down Madison or Fifth avenue, and knowing nothing of the elements of nineteenth century civilization, could have imagined that the alphabet, the printing press, creative art, the type setting machine, applied steam and electricity, peaceful commerce—these and a thousand other agencies of evolutionary development—who, we repeat, watching this Decoration Day apotheosis of picturesque mutilation and murder could have surmised that the American people had ever heard of science and its bloodless triumphs, of literature, of art, of scholarship, of invention, of the utilization of nature's crude materials and the harnessing of her wild forces for the peaceful promotion of human good? Have they never heard of Paine and arbitration? Have they forgotten the epochal settlement of the differences between this country and England growing out of the damages inflicted on our commerce by the privateer Alabama? Have they no desire to educate out of their children the inherited war lust of the centuries instead of spreading and intensifying the contagion?

Show us the official and popular holiday services and displays of a people, and we will tell you the dominant note in their civilization. Christian parents arm their children and teach them how to skillfully maim and kill their fellows; Freethinking parents take their children to the graveside of a man who, at the peril of his life, voted against the death of the overthrown chief of a system which he, the humanitarian, had done all he could to destroy, and who pleaded for the abandonment of the savage duel of war, and there they are instructed in the science of preservativ, productiv sociology. The difference between the two methods is the difference between militarism and industrialism, between savagery and civilization.

The train for New Rochelle left the Grand Central station at 10:45 A.M. There were five cars a little more than comfortably filled with Freethinkers from Brooklyn, Newark, Jersey City, New York, and other places. The day was an exceptionally hot one, the mercury standing at 84 degrees in the shade at 11 in the forenoon, with considerable humidity in the atmosphere. Last year the thermometer registered only 66 degrees at the same hour. But the people all seemed happy, and very glad of the opportunity to render their tribute of respect to the memory of the man to whom, as Freethinkers, Americans, and citizens of the world, they owe so much. They are getting acquainted with one another, and a few more such gatherings as that of last year and this will do very much to develop and strengthen the sentiment of solidarity and bring out the blossoms of sociability, a consummation greatly to be desired. It is a pleasant walk or drive from New Rochelle out to the old Paine Homestead, through tree-bordered lanes and by cosy residences embowered in leaf and bloom. The season is late this year, and so the pilgrims missed the millions of daisies that last year whitened the pastures and meadows, and which were so liberally drawn upon for bouquets and wreaths. The attendance from the cities was nearly as great as at the first memorial services, but the local turnout was not so good; possibly the clergy warned their flocks not to jeopard their souls in that reckless way again. The reporters were acquainted with only a few of those present, so the live Liberals not mentioned here must not think that any are intentionally slighted. Among those recognized were N. F. Griswold, of Meriden, Conn.; A. W. Sturdy, of Attleboro, Mass.; R. B. Ivins, of Hightstown, N. J.; Peter Eckler, Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., T. B. Wakeman, Henry Nichols, Mme. Louise David, George E. and Grace Macdonald, Mrs. E. M. Macdonald, Dr. Chas. L. and Marie Andrews, Thomas Duntze, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Rowley, Mr. and Mrs. Morgan A. Robertson, Miss S. Levin, Joseph Warwick, E. C. Walker, Wilson Macdonald, J. R. Macdonald, Miss Louise Minchen, Carroll, Ia.; Eugene Myers, Germantown, N. Y.; John Scott, D. T. Ames, Capt. G. W. Loyd, Eliza B. Burnz, Anna T. Burns, Channing Burns, Peter J. Cullen, Marie Cuminsky, Henry Frank, A. Watters, of Newark; Mr. and Mrs. W. V. Winham, and Robert H. Barry.

There was not much attempt at ornamentation this year. "Welcome" stretched across the road; "Spare the Man, but kill the Monarch," and "Thomas Paine, the Author-Hero of the American Revolution," were the mottoes. The wall surrounding the Monument has been repaired in a substantial manner, and for this occasion a few wreaths of flowers lay at the base of the Monument itself.

After the visitors had comfortably arranged themselves on the walls and grass and partaken of the refreshments they had brought with them or procured from the thrifty caterers on the grounds, Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., who was slated to preside, called the assemblage to order at 1 o'clock. Paine, he said, is worthy, we think, to be called the founder of the republic, and in the future he will share with Washington the honor of being the "Father of His Country." We would not detract from the just fame of Washington, but there is no doubt that in the creative ideal Paine led. Thomas Paine was the ideal reformer, the all-round reformer. He knew that it was not possible to progress along one line alone. He was not a man of one idea; he was not a mere hobby-rider. He protested against slavery and against cruelty to animals; he spoke for the equality of woman, for the substitution of arbitration for war. So Paine was one hundred years in advance of his time, as he was in advance of the other revolutionary leaders.

Following the chairman's happy introductory remarks came the "Ode to Thomas Paine," written by Geo. E. Macdonald, with music by J. R. Macdonald. The ode was first read by Henry Rowley from THE TRUTH SEEKER of last week, and then finely sung by the composer. Dr. Foote next introduced T. B. Wakeman, who delivered the following address, which was punctuated with frequent and generous applause:

MR. CHAIRMAN AND FRIENDS: The day of judgment has come at last. The law of evolution has brought it whether we will or no. The application of this law to all knowable affairs of nature or of man is the supreme judgment. Until this law had proved to us the real scientific and successional order of things and events, natural and human, we could never determine the true importance or value of peoples, nations, or religions—of their events, causes or battles—their great epochs or characters. But we are now living under the greater light of evolutionary history, which gives us not only the order of events and of the great peoples and individuals connected with them, but assigns and adjudges their true and relative part in the progress of the ages towards the tolerable civilization of the present we now enjoy, and the grander future for which we work and hope.

This Decoration Day is our national festival of the dead, and thus preëminently the day of judgment, upon which evolution points out to us the great characters which were her agents, instruments, and voice in causing our great republic to be, and upon which day evolution also fatefully admonishes our people that the qualities and virtues which founded the republic are absolutely essential to its continuance.

Standing here by his grave and monument, on the green fields which New York gave to him as some recognition of his services, let us ask of Evolution, What is the value and position of the "Author-Hero" of our Revolution in the great era of revolutions which made the last century the broad seed-field of the mighty harvest which is now growing and which the next century is to reap?

We cannot mistake the answer that evolution now, as the century is closing, gives to our question—viz., Thomas Paine was the initiative, creative, constructive mind, the first-hand soul, out of which came not only the "serious thought" and the "common sense," which changed our people into Republicans of "The United States," instead of "subjects of a king," but which also laid the foundation of the future "Republic of the World," and "the emancipation of mankind from tyrannies and superstitions" by the first announcement of the "Age of Reason," the "Rights of Man," and the "The Religion of Humanity." Every one of these grand and most pregnant phrases he was the first to use; every one of them describes a battle-field in the progress of our race. His career was that of the knight-errant of liberty in the beginning of the great struggle of which those words are the battle-flags, and his death left him the inspirer and prophet of the common people in their onward progress toward the final achievement of what those mighty words mean. When the little, local, tuppenny, temporary view of the Revolutions of the last century are replaced by the historical and evolutionary view, the career of Thomas Paine as the heart and voice of the people rises into its true significance. For him at last the higher day of judgment has come; time has brought it, and not the least of all has placed her pen in the hands of his recording, justifying, and avenging angel—his great biographer, Moncure D. Conway.

In contrast with most of the names which fill our biographical dictionaries it is evident at once that this man and the elements and motifs with which he worked raise him above ordinary men. Even the extraordinary men seem to lose their magnitude when measured by the problems, the purposes, the devotion, the prophecies, and the results with which the founders of the Revolutionary era are associated. Think for a moment of Napoleon Bonaparte, called Napoleon the Great, from the great noise and destruction he caused in pursuing "his destiny" of selfish aggrandizement. Where, now, is the outcome of it all? Mostly kicked into the gutter of the ages like the debris of some pyrotechnic display which was the wonder of a night, making the darkness that it seems to recall blacker than ever. But the star that arose from the "serious thought" of Thomas Paine was the herald of the Republican dawn, never to pale its light except in the beneficent dawn of the coming day.

1. How true all of this new and higher view of Paine's career and prophecy may be, as to the initiation of the republic in America, becomes more and more manifest. The rebellion of "subjects" at Lexington and Bunker Hill was turned into the war for independence and a republic by no mere accident. There was an evolution from one state of mind to the other unprecedented in history. It was experienced by some one mind first, by a soul-process as rare and unique as the forming a first crystal, which soon flashes a fluid ready for it into a solid form. This creative change was the result of the independent and peculiar origin, education, and circumstances of Thomas Paine, and there is much reason to suppose that without him and them it would not have been possible at all. Its foundation was the independency arising from Paine's birthright in Quakerism. Conway well says that if there had been no George Fox there could have been no Thomas Paine. Hence came his complete independence of the church and the crown—the altar and the scepter. As soon as he was on American soil he had no power to look to but the God of his fathers, but that deistic conception was not revealed to him in Quakerdom, through the Bible, or church, or priest, but by the contact of the soul alone and the influx of "the inner light." Even this Quaker conception of communion with God had been modified by science, which had made God to Paine the beneficent power and order of the world. Quakerism and science had enabled the soul of Paine to stand alone, and to conceive of his fellow man as so standing in America. Thus conceived, they became the units and initiators of a new form of independent government based on those units, "as the consent of the governed," and exercising their powers for their common protection and benefit. In a word, the first real democratic government on earth was conceived in and born from the peculiar soul of this independent, Americanized, scientized Quaker. Thence came his "Serious Thought" in 1775 and the "Common Sense" published early in January, 1776. Within the next six months that new state of mind which had originated with him had become the conviction of Washington and the effective part, if not the majority, of the American people. This change was no easy matter. Many, like Washington, who begged his reverend friend Boucher to think him

News and Notes.

I have seen so much this week—so many impressions have crowded into my mind—that I hardly know where to begin the tale. I can merely suggest the manifold phenomena of these busy days, and must omit any detailed description.

Robert Forder has taken good care of me this week. He is an earnest worker. He has been thirty-three years in the movement, and has been quite over England and Scotland and the continent. He has a vivid memory, and can tell many a story of the conflicts of Freethought. I had a delightful visit with his family on Wednesday evening, May 8th. We went over to the East side and enjoyed some of its theatrical splendors and surges of population—a picture indeed of the lights and shades of London life.

On Thursday Mr. Forder, George Ward, J. M. Wheeler, and myself, visited Woolwich Arsenal and marched through miles of buildings, and gazed upon the polished and splendid barbarism of this age, the magnificent means of destruction invented by a Christian nation at a cost of £60,000,000 a year, while only £2,000,000 a year are given by the same Christian nation for educational purposes. Woolwich Arsenal is a wonderful place. It employs about 11,000 men. We witnessed the manufacture of cartridges, rifles, shells, and tremendous cannon, big enough almost for a chapel. We saw the great hammer weighing seventy tons strike upon the flaming mass to harden it for warfare; also the foundries glimmering like the phantasmagoria of hell itself, and the bright and delicate machinery, which works almost like human intelligence, manipulating the missiles of death. What vigor is here expended, and what triumphs of human ingenuity are exhibited. What a terrific fighter England will be if ever put to her metal. The only consolation the philanthropist can derive is in the fact that these instruments of destruction are so supremely effective that no nation will wish to take the responsibility of conflict when such awful engines are brought into action. In this way Woolwich Arsenal preserves the peace.

Traveling homeward, we dropped into the buildings of the Royal Arsenal Coöperative Society, which my friend Forder helped to organize in 1868, when he was a workingman in the Arsenal. This society is a grandly successful institution. It started with a membership of twenty. It has now over 8,000. It began with a capital of about £7. A chest of tea was bought with this, and some butter and sugar. The first distribution was in a small back-room—the workshop of a Mr. Rose. During the first quarter the capital increased to £20, and the membership to 47. In 1873 there were 216 members. In 1880 the business reached nearly £25,000 a year. At the end of 1889 the membership was 6,721, the capital £62,786, and the yearly trade £126,076. The society during these years purchased and worked a farm, and established a coal depot. It owns forty horses, and carries on the businesses of grocery and provisions, drapery and millinery, bread, flour, and corn, butchering, tailoring, and outfitting, boots and shoes, furniture, china, and glass, market-gardening, milk, coal, and green-grocery. It employs about 180 persons. Fine reading-rooms have been established, and a library with several thousand volumes. Courses of lectures are given, and entertainments provided. Its bakery is a model of the latest inventive skill in the art of cooking. The success of this society in so many directions of trade and supply is a striking proof of the soundness of the principle of co-operation. It is a good stand-off to the Woolwich Arsenal, and preaches the real gospel of humanity. All for each, and each for all, is its motto, and it gives a glorious picture of man's prosperous future.

Thursday evening with Mr. George Ward I visited Parliament. I can't say that I was very much impressed with the House of Commons. There is not a particle of beauty or cheerfulness in it. I don't wonder that the members drift into the lobbies when they get a chance. It is a great square black room. The seats are draped in black and look very uncomfortable. The only white thing to be discovered is the wig of the speaker. He is seated in a kind of sentry's box, which is also covered with black. The galleries are very inadequate. Only ninety could be seated in the gallery I occupied, called, I believe, the Stranger's gallery, for which we have to procure tickets through some member of Parliament. John Burns favored us on this occasion. Our Hall of Representatives at Washington surpasses in beauty and convenience the House of Commons. In the latter are no separate seats. The members have to crowd together on long benches. I listened to a couple of speeches. I don't think the average oratory of the Commons will equal that of our Congress, although there are a few speakers of exceptional brilliancy. Not more than a hundred members were present this evening. The total membership is six hundred. Forty constitute a quorum, and when not more than that number can be got together the House adjourns. The "duffers" are allowed to speak during the dinner hour when but a few are compelled to listen to the talk. If one happens to be atrociously dull and long-winded, then a call is made of the House, at the request of any one member, and if forty can not be summoned the House adjourns. That is the way they have of getting rid of an intolerable bore. If he can't have at least forty listeners he is obliged to shut up.

This House of Commons has been built, I believe, only about thirty years; and how it could have been built in such a somber, contracted, and oppressive fashion I do not understand. It is certainly unworthy of the commanding power of the House of Commons. For the time being the House of Commons is the people; it is clothed with all the authority of the people, and it certainly should have a commodious and splendid assembly room, where the genius of man might flower in excellence and delight, and not be stifled in this dungeon-like abyss.

Here, however, was the great battle-ground of Bradlaugh for human rights, and this recollection gives a majesty and splendor to the scene it would not otherwise possess. The mighty athlete, fresh from the people, representing the vast outer world of reason and light, won at last in this dark hall of ancient custom and superstition. He had odds against him, and one of the odds was the architecture of the building. I do believe that if the House of Commons had been constructed somewhat on the Grecian style of grace and elegance and airy and noble beauty, Bradlaugh had not died just when he won the laurel. It was a dismal field on which he fought, and dauntless indeed must have been his heart to have pushed so victoriously and brightly forward in a house so fitly emblematic of the darkness of the ages. I hope present architecture will disappear, and that some day the English people will have a political temple worthy of their far-reaching and magnificent genius. Let Westminster Hall and St Paul stand for the past, but as yet there is no architecture to express the glowing future. The daring genius who shall break the shackles is yet to come. In the meantime I must affirm that our Capitol at Washington is a hundred times more beautiful and majestic than the gilded tomb of England, which, compared with the genuine architecture of the past—Westminster Abbey—is but shreds and patches, meaning nothing, for it has no ancestral life and no aspiring splendors leaping to the feature.

Friday, with my genial friend, Mr. George W. Foote, I visit the National Gallery. This is indeed beautiful; the rarest and noblest pictures of all time are on these walls, and what an enchantment they are; what form and color enrapture! It is a perfect delight. Beautiful women beam softly on you from the living canvas; landscapes of marvelous glory stretch away, sea and land and sky. I cannot describe the hundreds of pictures that, like magic, express the treasures of the universe. I have not the space even to write the names of these wonderful masters, for if I begin where shall I end in this gallery of the nations? For days one could wander through these halls of enchantment, and something new would ever flash upon the exhilarated mind. Here is genius unfettered and glorious, ranging earth and heaven, radiating beauty and joy, with the splendor of a god indeed. What courage it gives to the ever-striving spirit to behold the triumphs of these immortal ones who adorn history with such shining scepters.

We cannot always remain in this wonderland of art. We grow hungry, and we must mingle again with the busy world. At Simpson's ancient and renowned divan we meet Mr. George Anderson, in whose heart glows the fire of Scotland and the poetry of Burns, a gentleman of fortune and liberality. He is always ready to help, generous in the hour of need, a true and devoted Freethinker. We had a jolly dinner together. For the first time in my experience the saddle of mutton was wheeled in front of the table, and the savory meat cut directly from the haunch. That is the good old English way of doing it, and it is certainly like eating fruit right from the tree. All the delicacy of taste is preserved. Our generous repast was mingled with philosophy and poetry. Mr. Anderson delights in advanced literature. He gave me a brochure of his own—an excellent criticism of Cardinal Manning's position that the will is an entity outside the mind and moving the mind. This is the only way, of course, that the cardinal could preserve his theology. He must have a "substantial" ego—that is, a "soul"—for without a soul there is no immortality and no god worth speaking of. The critic conclusively demonstrates that the will cannot be separated from the mind, but is part of it, is one of its functions and acts with it, not independently but through motive. There is no "thinker" outside the brain, but thinking is simply the brain-process, as digestion is the stomach-process—and it is as reasonable to affirm that there is a "digerster" outside the stomach as to affirm that there is a "thinker" outside the brain. Thought is in the brain as digestion is in the stomach, and the former is no more an "entity" than the latter. Mr. Anderson also presented me with four beautiful volumes of Samuel Laing's writings, whose philosophy I shall take great pleasure in thoroughly studying.

Friday evening we behold the radiance of The Empire. The Women's Christian Temperance Union has poured all its batteries on the The Empire, and exhausted its powder. The Empire thus received a magnificent advertising and it is crowded every night. It is a beautiful theater. The performance was excellent. Especially wonderful and amazing was the Faust ballet. It is an ocean of color and flashing form; waves and waves of splendor ever bursting on the view; marching men, the mazes of the circling dance; the panoply and throne; the garden, mountain, and luminous sky, with Margaret and Faust in the strange fortunes of our sorrowing yet glorious humanity. The Women's Christian Temperance Union did not show much wisdom in its attack. Surely it is a despicable mind that could find anything in these beautiful attractions that could demoralize.

Saturday I travel to Hyde Park, in a coach, as big as any of them. Through Piccadilly I sweep on top of the grand omnibus, serenely as a king, and just as happy for aught I know. Through brilliant foliage I catch a glimpse of Buckingham Palace, and see the glitter of the guards. At Hyde Park corner I buy a seat for a penny and for an hour look at the bright and vast array of fashion which in its thousand carriages rolls along the smooth pavement of Rotten Row. I think it about as much fun to look on as to be one of the participants of the radiant galaxy. It is an interesting display of vanity and glory; both the crowds of people that gaze and the crowds of people that rush by. It is an exhilarating exhibit of the topmost swell of English life, ever varying like a motion of glittering billows. Just as I pass the gateway of the park on the swinging omnibus the Prince of Wales, his wife and two daughters, sweep by in their elegant equipage. The prince returns the cheerful salutes of the people. I was glad to have a glance of royalty. It satisfied a natural curiosity of the human heart. I did not feel like exchanging places, however, for my seat was the higher and I thought the better, and my appetite was first-rate, and I am sure that I enjoyed life as much as the prince. Pictures are as beautiful to me as to him; the green grass, flowers, and blue sky; the surging multitude, and all the magnificence of the scene. My ride cost me only a penny and for the time being it was just as gorgeous as that of royalty.

Sunday was quite a varied day for my perambulations and the study of London life. The first thing in the morning, with Mr. Robert Forder and Mr. George Brown, I visited that most famous and picturesque place, Petticoat Lane, on the east side. I most carefully divested myself of every article of value, for the saying is, that if, on entering Petticoat Lane, you buy a pocket-handkerchief, it will be stolen before you are half way through and offered for sale at the other end of the route. There is nothing like Petticoat Lane in the world that I know of—it is a conglomeration of all sorts of varieties. It is the Jew's quarter, and that is why they do business on Sunday, for it is perfectly quiet and holy-like on Saturday. But on Sunday what a buzz, what a clamor, what a rush—streams and eddies of people, with inextinguishable vivacity, buying and selling with marvelous rapidity. There is everything in the universe here, and so cheap—cheap as dirt, and cheaper, too. I guess, for, in many cases, the dirt is thrown in. Whole suits of clothes are sold for two shillings, a cake of ice cream for one penny, and so on. Half the goods are stolen, it is said, and hence the small prices, for there is a profit anyway. The poor people come here in throngs, and from about eleven to three it is Babel, but it's business strictly attended to, and it is certainly a "blessing in disguise" to those who are short of funds. It is a racy panorama of human nature, which, even in the midst of poverty, will put on fashion and make the best of little things. On bright days like last Sunday the goods are almost all taken out of the stores and placed on tables and boxes along the streets, and it is not one street, but a congregation of streets, and hence there is a fantastic display of out-door animation which is infinitely amusing. I had rather go to Petticoat Lane than any church of London, in order to see the "soul" of humanity, for here it is flashing in wonderful aspects over the dark depths of vice and crime.

After Petticoat Lane we take in the out-door meetings. These are a great feature of London. The Secularists, the Christians, the Labor Party, all hold these meetings. There are hundreds of them. In the great parks of London spaces are especially devoted to this purpose, and are under police protection. Any one can pitch in wherever he can find a plot of ground and make his speech, Christian, or anti-Christian, as he chooses. These meetings are of immense benefit, and give an opportunity for the volcanic flame to pour forth harmlessly. The beating heart of the nation finds vent. Agitation is kept up and education is the result. The parks are thus the natural universities of the people, and many a trained intellect has graduated from these tumultuous assemblies.

The Secular party keeps twenty of these outdoor meetings going every Sunday. I wish we could do the same in our country, but we have not yet the facilities nor, I might say, the personal freedom. The police would probably stop us. In some things the Englishman enjoys more liberty than the American, and he uses it, too, with advantage.

These outdoor meetings are recruiting stations, and from them the ranks of the Hall of Science are constantly filled up. Robert Forder, Arthur B. Moss, W. J. Ramsey, A. Guest, Stanley Jones, C. Cohen, George Strandring, E. Calvert, are among the effective workers in this department. The women also assist. Miss Annie Brown is secretary of the Federation; Miss E. M. Vance is secretary of the National Secular Society, with Miss Robins and others. The Secularists are more active and concentrated in their efforts here than in America. They have learned the ropes and don't scatter their fire, and the movement is always pushing ahead.

I attended the meeting in Finsbury Park. Geo. Ward was chairman, E. Calvert the lecturer. Mr. Calvert is by occupation a cabman; he is now nearly seventy years old, but he is hale and hearty and can tackle the orthodox with youthful vim. Forty-eight years he has been in this work without missing an appointment, and he intends to keep at it as long as he lives. That is the backbone of the English Freethinker. Discussion being invited at these meetings, a slim young fellow—a schoolmaster—arose to correct some references to Lecky, and he in turn was corrected by Forder, who knows Lecky by heart. Forder in reply made one of his vehement speeches, which fairly caught the crowd and left his opponent to recover himself as best he might by next Sunday morning, when he was invited to bring what he denominated his "valuable edition" of Lecky and demonstrate the accuracy of his quotations. It was an interesting wave of debate, and I was pleased with Forder's impetuous style and mastery of historic detail, and also with Calvert's quaint but charming manner of hitting orthodox with mother wit and practical learning; while Ward, the chairman, understood the art of smoothing the ruffled feathers of bigotry and keeping it to civilized decency. Sometimes, however, the wild-beast nature bursts forth and a riot is hardly avoided. Miss Mary Robins, at one of these brutal occurrences, received a blow in the breast from the effects of which she ultimately died, a martyr to Freethought. All honor to her memory!

Sunday evening I lectured at Camberwell. I had a full house and an enthusiastic reception. Robert Forder presided and made the opening address, which heralded a most generous welcome. After the lecture, which was on "The Bible and Modern Thought," Mr. Engstrom, secretary of the Christian Evidence Society, endeavored to make a reply. He, however, practically abandoned the real orthodox ground and placed himself in a somewhat advanced and Freethought position, denying that the Bible was in its totality a revelation from God, and affirming that it simply contained a revelation which we were to discover by the operation of the holy spirit and the love of Jesus. He also said that Calvinism was not the real Christian religion. I replied by showing that if Christianity had any intellectual doctrine whatsoever it must be Calvinism, and that if the Bible in its totality was not a revelation, then it could not be any revelation at all; for the moment the Bible ceases to be an infallible book, and becomes in any way amenable to human reason, then the human reason becomes the master of the situation, and revelation is simply what reason dictates.

In every way I was pleased with the Camberwell meeting, and the splendid support of the friends who labor here. Saladin was at this lecture, and I walked home with him, and made the acquaintance of his wife, and took supper at his genial table. We talked philosophy and poetry. Saladin is not in the organized Secular movement of England, and his philosophy really prevents him from hearty co-operation. He is an Agnostic intellectually, but in his heart he has strong leaning toward a sort of transcendental pantheism, which Spencer's doctrine of the Unknowable logically permits. Saladin's poetic nature urges him to an ideal view of human destiny, and he does not like to surrender the glorious inspirations of a life surpassing the bounds of this earthly existence. Saladin is a poet in the very fiber of his being, and with a poet's soul he would leap beyond "the flaming bounds of space and time." He is intensely anti-theological, as every poetical nature must be, for there never was and never will be any poetry in theology, but in the realms of philosophy Saladin would go somewhat beyond the data of science; he would revel in what Tyndall calls the "scientific imagination." Science deals only with phenomena, but Saladin would go beyond the phenomena to the noumenon, and if we allow the noumenon, then we are left logically free, as Spencer affirms, to make it physical or material, and of course the poetic fervors of Saladin incline him to the physical noumenon, and in this he is Spencerian and not Positivist. I do not quarrel with Saladin's ideal philosophy, for I like his poetry. He has the genuine fire, and he uses it most effectually in his anti-theological arguments. He pours the sparkling batteries of his thought with destructive brilliancy upon "God and his Bible" and all the old time superstitions and horror. I presume it is best that he labor in his own individual way in harmony with the peculiarities of his imaginative genius. As a poet we must judge him even in his prose. He was born to poetry, and its red blood beats in heart and brain. He realizes the glory of the past, and hopes for an ampler life than this world now affords. He has the poetic writings of Burns by heart, and if every rhythmic word of the great bard were now destroyed, Saladin could restore the poet's glowing utterances out of his own memory. So Sunday passed—a rich and happy day.

Monday evening, May 13th, after my day's work of writing the first part of News and Notes, at the restaurant, while taking dinner, I happened to meet Prof. Edwin Johnson, whom I had not seen before, but knew by reputation. He is author of "A Study of Christian Origins," "The Rise of Christendom," and "The Pauline Epistles." He is a man of marvelous erudition. His books are remarkable. His theory is that all the Christian Bible documents, together with some of the "ancient classics," were forged about four hundred years ago. This may seem, at first note, a preposterous assertion, but it is well worth looking into. "History," says Wendell Phillips, "is a great lie." I should not be at all astonished if Professor Johnson had hit some historic lies. I can't accept his theory altogether. Still there are some good points, and the student should become acquainted with them. It is scarcely possible for one to realize the dense ignorance of our fathers four hundred years ago, and how easily they were gulled. The gullibility of the human race is amazing, and Professor Johnson has furnished instances of this. I had the pleasure of taking dinner with him and making the acquaintance of Mrs. Johnson. I hope for further intercourse with this scholarly philosopher, who has startled the literary and theological world with a bombshell of such explosive quality. I have no doubt it will throw some light on the darkness of the credulous past.

While finishing these notes Charles Watts arrives from Glasgow, where he has been making a brilliant campaign. I rejoice to meet him. To recruit our exhausted energies we mount one of the big omnibuses and take a long journey through Regent street, and other thoroughfares, and gaze upon the most fashionable and magnificent portions of London. I guess there is no place where, for three pennies, you can take such a ponderous ride and see such innumerable aspects as in London. A day on top of the coaches is a most animating adventure. No theater can equal the show.

After this breezy journey we take supper together with Mrs. Watts, and old times in America are revived.

To-day we go to Derby, where Foote debates. I shall write this up for next week.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Saladin and the Secular Pilgrim.

From the Agnostic Journal.

Last Sunday evening the Freethought hall, Camberwell, was filled to its full capacity by an expectant audience. The American orator, poet, and Freethought historian, whose name heads this monograph, had been announced to speak on the antithetical subject, "The Bible and Modern Thought." As the lecturer made his appearance he was hailed with a long, loud, and straggling volley of handclapping and heel-thumping—a tradition of the old Bradlaugh days. This palmist and pedal demonstration a contemporary refers to as "an English cheer." Mr. Putnam is a compactly built, medium-sized man, with just the souppçon of a cleric who has been unfrocked for erring, and not on the side of austerity; for, truly, his face is merry as well as wise. It is muscular as well as mobile. It has ruts in it, torn by the harrows of years and care; but they are subdued and mellowed with the dimples of laughter and evidence of that ripe practical philosophy which, without much ado, bends to the fate it cannot resist.

Mr. Putnam, on the platform, takes no formal notice that "Mr. Chairman" is present, or even, from the £ s. d. aspect of the thing, the indispensable "ladies and gentlemen." He just stands rather languidly up, reaches out his right hand, and in colloquial voice, but singularly clear articulation, glides into his lecture. The lecture itself, on Sunday evening, was in no sense recondite; but it was useful as touching the salient points of antitheses between the "Hebrew bundle of old clothes" and the triumphs of modern philology and cosmography. And this is as it should be. Lectures such as Mr. Putnam delivers are, of course, not for the instruction and edification of experts, but to stimulate the thought and inquiry of the wayfaring man, and induce him to take a hammer and cold chisel, and cut the theological rivets from his limbs and hurl them in priestcraft's face. It is only at wide intervals you can catch the Yankee twang in Mr. Putnam's delivery; but you can more frequently sniff the special aroma of Yankee humor.

Although I am, through long custom, involuntarily more of a critic than a mere staple member of the audience, one, at least, of our American orator's sallies elicited from me a loud guffaw; and a Scottish laugh is quite as real an entity as "an English cheer." The lecturer was speaking of the theories of the ancient geographers. The earth was flat; it was supported upon the back of an elephant; the elephant was supported by the back of a tortoise; the tortoise was supported by the back of Atlas. And here ancient cosmography stopped short. It could not tell what supported Atlas. But Mr. Putnam could—Atlas married a rich wife, and she supported him. The audience laughed hilariously. The wheeze was smart in itself, and was broached with that dry and imperturbable air which can be effectively assumed only by one with the natural dash of the comedian in his composition.

But I liked Mr. Putnam best in his more solemn and soul-stirring bursts of indignant declamation. He has not the volcanic passion, mighty resonance, and intense power of my dear old enemy, the late Mr. Bradlaugh, distinctively the Titan of the platform; but his voice is full and effective, and in excellent discipline and control; his diction is clear and nervous; and he makes his points sharply and definitely, without merely outlining them on the one hand, or unduly elaborating them on the other. His facial expression lends itself readily to dramatic light and shade, and his gesticulation is spontaneous and apposite. Mr. Robert Forder made a courteous and practiced chairman. The Rev. Mr. Engstrom, whom many of my readers will remember as fighting with Julian in these columns over Tatian's "Diatessaron," opposed; but our reverend polemic is more effective in the press than on the platform.

Mr. Putnam had been strongly recommended to my consideration by my good friend, Eugene M. Macdonald, of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, and other American friends; but he is that sort of good wine that needs no bush. With a fraternal liking for him, I just linked his arm in mine, and, in the commingled moon-light and gas-light, led him off to the smithy, and showed him the anvil on which I hammer out the hebdomadal "At Randoms." We passed an hour or two together in the happiness which is realized only in the social affinity of kindred spirits. The wide ocean had, all our lives, separated genial, kind-hearted, clear-headed Samuel Putnam and myself; but we had long known and recognized each other in that reciprocity of thought and aspiration to which continents are no barrier and oceans are as nothing. And now we were together in the same little book-room. Kings may be blest, but we were glorious. And, vowing off to meet again, we shook hands and parted, so as to enable our transatlantic brother to keep "respectable hours" and reach his apartments before "the wee short hour ayont the twal." SALADIN.

THE TRUTH SEEKER's offer to send eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" to eight different addresses or to one, to be used for missionary purposes, is still open. The best results are reported from this method of reaching intelligent believers and giving a new direction to their thoughts.

BY THE GRAVE OF THOMAS PAINE.

capable of every wickedness if he gave in to "independence," gradually acquiesced, and the Immortal Declaration, of which Jefferson was the writer and Paine the real author, founded this republic. There is no use in longer trying to write the history of the "United States of America" and yet omitting this evolutionary but individual factor from which they sprang in name and fact. This is the omitted, unwritten chapter in American histories which makes them all causeless and apocryphal as to the real origin of this first republic of equal, independent citizens—each free and equal before the law and in his right to do his duty without regard to god or king, pope or priest. We may well say that Washington was the father of our country, that Franklin was its great diplomat and philosopher, that Jefferson was its great exponent and reformer, Hamilton its great administrator and organizer; but they would never have had a country at all if Thomas Paine had not first found it and founded it in his own soul and then in the hearts and souls of the American rebels of 1776. Evolution bids us to go back to this initial germ, the original, first-hand soul of this emancipated, fighting Quaker, for the real origin of our republic and of all modern republicanism, democracy, and popular government in this world. Let us have no more shallow, metaphysical, or theological histories, as though this new state of mind originated without any germ, or the germ without sufficient evolutionary antecedents and co-operating conditions and circumstances. The republic of, for, and by the people was a new conception, which Locke and Vyse in England, Adams and Franklin in America, and Voltaire and Rousseau in France, had never reached.

2. The next important step in the founding of this republic was the organization of the Federal government for general purposes. This was a part of Paine's original conception of "Continental Legislation," which first appeared in 1775, in his "Serious Thought," and is the subject of his fifteenth, the last number of the Crisis, which is his farewell address at the close of the war. This was the proposal of the Federal Constitution, and never was it more effectively or eloquently projected than in this first appeal to the American people to make one "nation" of the distracted and wrangling peoples and colonies.

3. But before the people were ripe to act upon this suggestion and appeal Paine was engaged in England upon a still grander conception, as original as our (the first secular) republic had been, also the outcome of his enlarged, scientized, and humanized Quakerism, that was the foundation of "the republic of the world," of which our republic should be the cornerstone, and the result of which should be the final end of tyranny, robbery, slavery, war, and conquest. This was the secular form of the Quaker's dream of peace. This became the dream and prophecy of this international statesman of the people one hundred years ago. His purpose was to arouse the people to make their governments republics, in order to bring them into a grand republic, a federation of the peoples, a parliament of the world. In his day he strove to unite America, England, France, Belgium, and the Low Countries for this purpose. It was not then a wild dream. It barely failed of realization. But for Napoleon, might it not have been a fact? For fifteen years, 1787 to 1802, he was in Europe, trying to educate the peoples and to mold them into republics for this great consummation. Finally, when the reaction had set in—of the aristocracy led by Burke in England, of Napoleon and the Concordat in France, of the Federalists and the clergy in America—he then, like the faithful Abdiel of liberty, republicanism, and peace, sought to use the diplomacy of Jefferson to secure a "maritime compact" of civilization, so that liberty might have a home on the waves of the ocean, even if not a resting-place on the land, scarcely a foothold even in his beloved America!

4. The fact that liberty and peace could not be guaranteed by international federation, he saw plainly was the result of the religious and industrial subjection of the peoples. Before his return to America (1802) he had therefore turned the wonderful powers of his heart and mind toward the fundamental education and emancipation of his fellowmen from religious superstition and monopolistic greed. Hence came his last legacies and prophecies, the "Age of Reason" and "Agrarian Justice," as the foundations of the Rights of Man and the Republic of the World. We have been too much in the habit of thinking of Paine as a man mostly of the past, like most of the other great men of his time. But evolution now teaches us a far different story, lesson, and duty. He of all the men of the Revolutions represented and voiced the instinct of the common people for their final emancipation. The very titles of his works are initiatory battles which the next century must complete with victory. Not to see and appreciate, much less to belittle, these grand and continuous purposes of this human and planetary statesman, proves the critic and detractor to be no evolutionary statesman at all, not to have risen into the atmosphere in which Paine lived and by which he was inspired. True, he had not all of the learning of his, to say nothing of our, time, and he shared the defects which the people inherited from a past he wished to remove, but he was the voice of the common people, their true prophet, leading them to liberty, science, and humanity, whereby only their oppression, and consequent defects and limitations, can be removed! Right well is it, therefore, for political and social evolutionists to gather around the grave and monument of Thomas Paine in this our national festival of the dead, for consecration is inspiration. To honor the prophet is the first step toward the continuance of his work and purpose. And in that regard is there not a duty right here before us—right at hand? It is evident that Mr. Frazee, the devoted artist who gave us this noble monument in 1839, shaped it for, and probably meant that it should some day be completed and crowned by, a worthy bust of the great liberator. He thus left something for us, the next generation, to do, and ours is now the happy opportunity. Wilson Macdonald, the distinguished American sculptor, has been chosen president of the Paine Historical Society. Before the frosts now settling on his brow can reach his heart—before his skilful hand returns to the clay of which it is now the creative master—let us see to it that his heart and hand shall make this monument speak to future generations the undying messages and purposes of Thomas

Paine from his present form! Then, as those purposes are being realized, the love and gratitude of those generations will perhaps repurchase and change these beautiful fields, once given to him for the defense of liberty, into a park and a school devoted to the education of youth—where "knowledge can unroll her page rich with the spoils of time" without being repressed by "chill penury," or, still worse, giving hostages to superstition and plutocracy not to use the power gained for liberty, truth, and humanity.

But the greater admonition this occasion brings to us is to recall the great soul-quality which was the chief inspiration of our author-hero. In a word, it was independent, earnest, sacrificing devotion to the great cause of his age, and of our age, the progress and welfare of mankind without regard to race or nation, sex or sect.

This was the great object of his life, and he was devotedly earnest about it. This was the ground-work of his character and career, and it made him independent, self-sacrificing, and regardless of social honors or distinctions. No one could influence him or swerve him from the course of truth. The honored guest of Burke, he was the first to declare his recreancy as the pensioned advocate of tyrants; the friend and admirer of Washington, he was not silent over the ingratitude that remains the greatest spot upon his sun of glory.

It is that veracious earnestness of Paine that our people have lost—and in the loss of it they are in danger of losing all. We have great need of the revival of that spirit of '76. Because Galileo's telescope has knocked out the old heaven and theology with its hell, our people are getting to be frivolous snobocrats. They seem to think that there is nothing to live for but to "have a good time" by gratifying their appetites, pride, vanities, or idle curiosity. They need to learn from Paine that the duty of inaugurating the terrestrial heaven is a duty more impressive and urgent and more difficult to attain than any old celestial heaven above the clouds, and that the hell of human misery is a reality far more terrible and difficult to abolish than the scorching flames of Dante's hell. When I see the indifference of our rising generation—how they go for nothing beyond individual gratification of the moment, or waste their lives in faintly grasping after the "infinite" or some other of the inanities of the metaphysical spookism that science has shown to be only the continuance of the childish illusions of the childhood of our race—I sometimes wish that sturdy old Jonathan Edwards or the devil would spit them over a brimstone hell until they could recover some belief in the earnestness of this life. But the better remedy is the voice of evolution speaking from the graves of the earnest departed who began the great contest against the cruelties, the miseries, the windy inanities of our modern, practical hell. The earnestness and value of this life and its unceasing consequences, was the constant inspiration and lesson of Paine and his fellow Revolutionists.

5. Nor less, and as a consequence, do they call us to untiring work and industry; and, if need be, sacrifice. In the advance toward the higher and better state of existence the human will is a mighty factor. Evolution is dumb and blind; the human mind is the supplement and complement of the laws of nature, using them for human ends. The great revolutionists felt this all-important truth. We are forgetting it in becoming thoughtless evolutionists. Paine never ceased his work—"Without haste, without rest," seems to have been the habit of his life. Yet in all he was the most practical of the reformers of his time. He was a constitutional republican, who did not believe with the Jacobins that "the Revolution" could run a government, nor with the Federalists that the "Republic" must be run by a mob or "consensus of the competent" because the people "could not be trusted." The persevering expansion of the sentiments and purposes of the real founder of this Republic is the only means by which it can be preserved, and a government of, for, and by the people be secured to the human race. Paine's appeal, like that of Lincoln, was to the plain people, and to them he must be used as a prophet, for him they never fail to understand. For them, as he says, he dipped his pen into his own heart.

6. This brings up the faith, the final great soul-quality for which this revolutionist and prophet should stand in this generation. If ever a man had reason to despair of the consummation of his great purposes Paine should have closed his political career without a hope. Everything he had tried to do had been misunderstood, thwarted, and apparently defeated. His old personal acquaintances and hoped-for co-operators had gone over to the cause of reaction. How could the old man sit and think how he had grasped the hands of Burke, Bonaparte, and Hamilton as his great friends and sustainers, and not despair? Yet this change of the instruments of the present only led him to plow deeper for the future. He saw that the people were not ready. The Age of Reason and Agrarian and Industrial Justice did not exist for them. Some other time they would learn, for he would begin to spread the seed far and wide, then sink to his rest in the hope and belief that "the Religion of Humanity," which he was the first to name, would finally replace the religion of gods and devils and inhumanity against which he had striven.

This was his sublime faith. At bottom Thomas Paine was a profoundly religious man, perhaps the most religious of his day. His God was nature, the beneficent order of the world; his Christ was humanity evolving onward in the making of a terrestrial heaven based upon that order. This very object of itself secures his and the salvation of all those who work for it; for is it not the "kingdom of heaven" already "within you?" Toward the realization of this supreme object of human life the career of Thomas Paine was devoted; the steps which he urged and participated in are found to have been true and durable; the means and soul-qualities he illustrated and used are those by and upon which the victory is to be won. This is plainly the verdict of evolution and human progress. The battle is still on—after a hundred years it is being renewed nearly where he left it. He who wrote the "Crisis" by the campfires of Valley Forge asks from this monument: Can you do nothing but dream as a sunshine patriot over the issues upon which the higher hopes of our country and the world hang for their completion?

Henry Rowley, who is always warmly welcomed by all who have previously had the pleasure of listening to him, was the next speaker. He said:

"MR. CHAIRMAN AND FRIENDS: May I ask you why are we here? What is the real purpose of this demonstration? Shall you be ashamed to-morrow of the thing you have done this day? If your names should appear in to-morrow's papers as being present at this meeting, will you attempt to excuse yourselves on the ground that you happened to be passing this spot and merely stopped to listen to one or two of the speeches, and that you have no special interest in the theories of the author of 'Common Sense' and the 'Age of Reason'? I sincerely trust no person here will take such a position. Let us own up, friends, honestly, before the world that we are not ashamed of Thomas Paine, and strive earnestly to disseminate, throughout the world, the truth regarding him and the part he played in the great drama of human emancipation.

"Why do we honor Paine? Because he tried to tell the truth concerning vested interests and entrenched authority. Few men have the faculty of directness of speech. Most men use words to conceal their thoughts. If you want to express your thoughts against existing ecclesiastical institutions, and, at the same time, preserve your reputation, you must do it in a way that no one can understand. Be technical and abstruse. Be mysterious and inconsequential, and the clergy will smile at your impotence. Paine did not follow this method. He wanted to be understood, and he wanted the common people to understand the bases of kingship and priesthood.

"Therein lies his great sin. He said that 'one honest man is of more value to society than all the crowned ruffians that ever lived.' Every man can understand that. There's no beating about the bush. The truth contained in the remark strikes the mind with lightning rapidity and illumines the whole question. Do you believe this? You do. Then let us be honest and truthful ourselves and endeavor to increase the race of honest men, for in a community of honesty there is no room for crowned villainy.

"Paine's mind was intensely logical, and he pushed every principle to its full conclusion. He knew that the crown and the miter were twins, that the church and the throne were in partnership to subjugate the human family, and that to destroy the one and leave the other in possession was useless. So he said: 'One schoolmaster did more useful work than all the priests that ever lived.' Do you believe this? Then we must decrease the number of priests and increase the number of schoolmasters. The churches must go and the school-houses take their places.

"We honor Paine because he was great—great in the full sense of the term. Colonel Ingersoll, whose presence and eloquence we miss to-day, has given us a definition of a great man. He says: 'A great man adds to the sum of knowledge, extends the horizon of thought, releases souls from the Bastille of fear, crosses unknown and mysterious seas, gives new islands and new continents to the domain of thought, new constellations to the firmament of mind. A great man does not seek applause or place; he seeks for truth; he seeks the road to happiness, and what he ascertains he gives to others. A great man throws pearls before swine, and the swine are sometimes changed to men. If the great had always kept their pearls, vast multitudes would be barbarians now. A great man is a torch in the darkness, a beacon in superstition's night, an inspiration and a prophecy.'

"Read the life of Paine and you will find that this is not only a definition of a great man but an epitome of Paine's work. He was singularly unselfish—seeking neither applause nor place—always devoted to the principle of human liberty. For years he cast the pearls of his genius before the world. He had no sooner discovered a new principle, or, to be more correct, a practical plan to apply a principle to human society, than he hastened to announce it to the world. His mind was an immense storehouse of facts and wisdom which he scattered with profusion. He was a torch in the darkness, and when that darkness was most intense his torch alone shone with a clear and steady brightness."

Wilson Macdonald, introduced as a veteran of the Manhattan Liberal Club, said that Paine would take his place in history beside Washington, Jefferson, and Franklin. Bulwer-Lytton undoubtedly had Paine in mind when he put into the mouth of Richelieu the now famous words:

Beneath the rule of men entirely great
The pen is mightier than the sword, for surely no other pen ever accomplished such results as that of the Author-Hero, which should be preserved in the national museum with the sword of Washington. Paine was generous as well as otherwise great; he gave his own salary and started a subscription that resulted in the raising of three hundred thousand pounds for the support of the federal army. Mr. Macdonald told the audience that he had attended the birthday celebrations of Thomas Paine for just one-half a century.

Mr. Augustus Watters, of Newark, author of a thoughtful little volume—"The New Age of Reason"—reviewed in this paper last year, wished to bear testimony to the humanitarian side of Paine's character. Paine was a man of the profoundest tenderness of heart; he could never have endured seeing all these people standing through the long exercises of this day, and he, the speaker, would for the same reason cut his remarks off very short. It was the greatest shame that our government allowed Paine to lie for eleven months in the prison of the Luxembourg, every day in danger of death the next hour. Paine wanted to make all the slaves free, he wanted to incorporate a provision to that effect in the Constitution, but his humanity and wise statesmanship were voted out by those interested in the peculiar institution. If Paine had been heeded we should have been spared all the frightful pain and loss caused by the slaveholder's rebellion, and all the terrible cost and demoralization that still follow in its wake.

Mr. Joseph Warwick, of Brooklyn, pointed out the cause of Paine's imprisonment. Gouverneur Morris was minister from the new republic to France, and he hated Paine. There was no charge made against the author of "The Rights of Man." Morris could easily have procured his release, but instead he tried to blacken his character to the home government, and probably conspired against him with his French enemies. Paine had the best of reasons for expecting that each day would be his last, but under this great stress of circumstances he wrote the first part of the marvelous critical work, "The Age of Reason," and with no copy of the Bible to which to refer. James Monroe succeeded Morris as minister to France, and Paine was released as an American citizen. Morris went to London and joined all the reactionary societies, working against Paine's reformatory ideas. "A viler man never trod the soil of America than Gouverneur Morris," Mr. Warwick emphatically affirmed. Still Paine harbored no ill-will toward him, sought no revenge. [It is clear, however, that he never fully sounded the depths of Morris's depravity—never understood how the representative of his country had schemed against him.] Mr. Warwick is of the opinion that in some instances Paine "was a little too soft on his enemies." "I would have gone to Gouverneur Morris and made life hot for him, and I don't think I would have been any the worse for it either." After all, though, Mr. Warwick concluded that we all respect and love Paine because he did not seek vengeance.

After an oration by Rev. Henry Frank, Henry Rowley read this letter from Rev. F. E. Mason:

BROOKLYN, N. Y., May 29, 1895.

MR. ROWLEY, President of Brooklyn Philosophical Society, My Dear Sir and Friends: Circumstances have prevented my taking part in the Paine celebration today. I deeply regret not being present, and appreciate you kind invitation to join with you.

The world is slowly but surely awakening to the "age of reason." With it comes man's independence. Ecclesiasticism has almost reached the end of its tether. The era of independent thought is imminent.

Religions have succeeded in erecting a tower of Babel which has ended in a confusion of tongues. They have severed human interests, and have provoked needless discord. A retrospective glance down the vistas of time discloses the fact that religions have been a detriment to man. They have retarded his advancement and minimized his possibilities. I firmly believe that every interloping messiah, prophet, redeemer, and savior that the world has ever delineated must be eliminated from human consciousness before man can gain his independence. Man himself must occupy the position ascribed to them. Intelligence is the only savior of the world. Ignorance is the only devil.

I consider the words of Thomas Paine: "The world is my country; to do good, my religion," the most sublime ever uttered by man. What altruism! By whom have these words been excelled? Put me on record as saying, They must stand at the head of every reform; they sound the death-knell of every religion. Religions would be superfluous were men to follow such instruction. And Thomas Paine is declared an Infidel! It is too absurd to be ridiculous. What is an Infidel, one who does not believe in God, or one who does not believe in somebody's else god? Why, the latter, of course. Thomas Paine's conception of God was so magnificently grand that there was nothing large enough in the universe by which to measure him, and he was repudiated because he didn't make a dwarf of him. The man who delineates God simply makes a mental idol and transforms himself into an ecclesiastical pigmy. Thomas Paine preferred to remain a man.

Would that all men were the same kind of an Infidel as was Thomas Paine! How could a man with such expanse of mind curtail it to fit religious dogmas? It is impossible to put a quart of brains into an ecclesiastical pint measure. They slop over.

The mind of Thomas Paine still lives. It is ours today. It is your place to revive it that the same mind may be in others that was also in him. It is the leaven that shall leaven the lump of human consciousness until man is utterly resurrected from the tomb of traditionalism and is no longer a vassal to the dead past nor a pensioner upon a vacuous future. Find the man in man, and you redeem him.

We tend toward the Utopia to which Thomas Paine pointed. It flows with the milk and the honey of reason. May we reach it, is all I ask. Independence is man's birthright. So long as man continues to pay the pope, the priest, and the pastor to do his thinking, so long will he remain a slave. I am with you in mind, and mind is the motive power of the universe. Teach people to exercise it by thinking for themselves, and you will make them sovereigns over the world. This was the mission of Thomas Paine. It is our prerogative to embody his mind that humanity may be redeemed from the tyranny of the dead, and the despotism of ignorance.

Cordially yours, FRANK E. MASON.

After the discussion of some business matters, part of the audience immediately returned to their respective homes, while the others first paid a visit to the Paine Homestead.

At the suggestion of Mr. John Scott, of Northport, Long Island, who headed the list with his contribution, a subscription was opened for the bronze bust, and before the assemblage dispersed sums aggregating $200 had been subscribed. The cost of the work is estimated at $2,000. Secretary Thomas Duntze of the Brooklyn Philosophical Society reports that the subscriptions came in so fast that it was impossible to record all the names accurately. Following are the donors:

John Scott, $1; Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., $50; Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., $50; Mrs. Eliza B. Burnz, $5; Sturdy Friend, $1; Leforte, $1; Cupler, $1; Henry Stone, $1; Friend, $1; Volekner, $1; J. R. Macdonald, $1; Curtiss, $5; Prof. D. T. Ames, $2; P. H. Wenz, $2; Unknown, 2; Henry Frank, $2; Hickling, $1; Chas. H. Delano, $2; Bamforth, $1; Berylson, $1; R. B. Ivins, $1; Mrs. E. M. Macdonald, $1; L. D. Crine, $25; T. B. Wakeman, $5; Ad. Ferris, $5; Channing Burnz, $10; Tooker, $1; Mrs. Blood, $1; N. F. Griswold, $20.

Until further arrangements can be made a committee of three have charge of the subscriptions, the members being Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., 120 Lexington avenue, New York; Henry Rowley, 251 Carlton avenue, Brooklyn, and Thomas Duntze, 24 Stockholm street, Brooklyn. Those desiring to contribute may address either of the above.

Observations.

Rational interpretation of the scriptures is progressing by means of long leaps in these so-called fin de siècle days. The parable of the ten virgins, in Matthew xxv, long since got frayed at the edges by centuries of use as a reminder of the necessity of salting down a large supply of faith against the last day, but an illustration in Sunday's Herald gives the narrative a new and up-to-date outfit. To the gaze of modern criticism it is revealed that the ten alleged virgins started for the wedding on bicycles; also, that five of them neglected to put kerosene in their lamps, which went out, and the girls were arrested by a minion of the law for riding after dark without a light.

It begins to look as though readers interested in Mr. S. P. Putnam's experience with the "English cheer" would have to hear one before they can enjoy settled convictions about the nature of that form of demonstration. Saladin of the Agnostic Journal speaks of it as "a long, loud, and straggling volley of hand-clapping and heel-thumping," which is a good enough description of the American way of applauding, except among our German citizens, who remove their cigars and emit the syllable "Hoch!" direct from the liver. My impression of the English cheer was that it included "Bravo!" uttered with some stress of voice. Scotch cheer is said to be distinguished by a somewhat smoky though not unpalatable flavor.

The tribute of "singularly clear articulation" which Saladin pays to the Secular Pilgrim must be gratifying, although it is merited, for in enunciation and orthoëpy our representative has few equals. To have won such praise from a scholarly subject of the queen of England, and to have sent a joke through the armor of Scotch gravity, all in one day, will be recalled by Mr. Putnam, I fancy, as among the most notable of his oratorical feats.

When the subscription for the Paine bust is closed I hope that enough funds will have been raised to quiet the title to the lot on which the monument stands. On second thought, it may be even more important that the lot should be acquired than that the monument should be surmounted with a Bust. The ground belongs to nobody in particular. It is not claimed by the owner of the farm, but he is a man well along in years; at his death the estate is liable to division, and his successor, especially if he happens to be pious, may take a different view. The good people who assembled about the monument on Decoration day were really trespassing, though they meant no offense. Whether there is anything to prevent some future owner of the farm from excluding Paine's admirer's from the premises, or even removing the monument, would have to be settled in court, where those who now contribute toward the contemplated bronze would have no special standing. Beyond keeping the monument and wall in repair, the outlay of a large sum of money by Liberals on property they do not own and cannot control or protect, seems imprudent. The application of a few hundred dollars to the acquisition of the lot, its ownership to be vested in some incorporated society or company and surrounding the ground with an iron fence of appropriate height and stability, would seem to be a proper initial step toward crowning the monument with a valuable Bust.

The Church Union, a religious paper with headquarters in New York, has been excluded from the mails for running a lottery scheme. This is altogether surprising, for the editor and proprietor of the sheet is none other than Mrs. Elizabeth Granis, the all-round reformer who gained some notoriety not long ago by rushing a crusade against living pictures and low-necked dresses. Mr. Granis protests that there was nothing immoral about her lottery, and she is probably right, but the ladies whose display of sinus she criticised may say with truth that their low-necksexhibition was equally harmless. Responding to popular demand, the Hon. Mr. Hoar of Massachusetts and the Hon. Mr. Gorham of Maryland, who were instrumental in spreading this lottery net, should tell what they think of the fish they have caught in it.

After duly wrestling in prayer, weeping for a season, and petitioning the throne of grace for wisdom which they should have acquired at a woman's school, the members of the general assembly of the Presbyterian church resolved that they would exclude from the ministry all students of Union Theological Seminary, where the enlightened Dr. Briggs is a professor. The young men who have provided themselves with a stock of Calvinistic theology, modified by the higher criticism which proves it to be a humbug, and who now find the way to the Presbyterian pulpit too narrow for their load, are in a fix something like Robinson Crusoe's when he had finished his boat and discovered that there was a hill between him and the ocean. Still, Dr. Briggs's pupils do not necessarily have to launch their craft in Presbyterian waters, for the sea of Rationalism is a big one, and its waves come pretty near to the foundations of the Union Theological Seminary. This way, boys!

The Mexican minister at Washington, Señor Romero, has contributed to the North American Review an article on the finances of his country that will anguish the hearts of our gold monometalists. Mexico has silver dollars, and to that fact Señor Romero attributes, to a large extent, its increasing prosperity. The obstinate refusal of other countries to take silver dollars for what they are worth, in exchange for products, stimulates home manufactures, which are building up in a gratifying manner. Not only that, but some manufacturers from the United States are removing their plants to Mexico. As a consequence, labor finds employment and there are no strikes, the tendency of wages being to increase. Mining is lively, the banks are flush, the circulation is active, and nobody is idle who wants to work. Coming from a scrub republic like Mexico, Señor Romero does not presume to comment on the monetary question confronting the people of the United States, but he is as earnest a defender of silver for his country as the average Englishman is of free trade for Great Britain. If our goldbugs' heads are level, they will not delay sending Eli Perkins to Mexico as a correspondent for the capitalistic press. There are going to be big openings on both sides for liars in the approaching campaign, and the side that has the most talented one will stand the best chance to win.

During the past winter somebody unearthed "fresh evidence" that the "Junius Letters" were written by Sir Philip Francis. The said evidence was accepted as conclusive, and stock in W. H. Burr's theory that Thomas Paine wrote the Junius philippics found few takers at any price. Now a writer to a London magazine produces a letter by Junius written when Francis had been five months absent from England, and dealing with events of which he could have known nothing, as he was in India. That lets Sir Philip out, and unless an alibi can be proved for Paine, Colonel Burr's client is not yet acquitted. Whatever the verdict, Mr. Burr has the opposing counsel in a hole, and his forbearance in not taking advantage of his present opportunity to show a certain Chicago editor the folly of overflowing his banks without due deliberation, is more than admirable—it is beatific. Yours truly, WM. B. ALLEN.

HARWOOD MINES, PA., May 17, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $4.50 for six months' subscription for myself, and a new subscription one year for Mr. J. Harry Silverman. Please send the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" to my address. I think I will soon be able to get some more new subscribers. M. J. PALINKAS.

ELMHRA, N. Y., May 18, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I received a sample copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER containing a "Special New Subscriber Offer" of the paper one year and the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book," both for $3, which you will find inclosed. I think that I will be able to send you some few subscribers.

Yours fraternally, DR. U. G. BECK.

GUNNISON, COL., May 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3, for which please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year and the "Pictorial Text-Book." In these times, when, under the guise of patriotism, A. P. As. fight Catholics on account of their religion, it is a relief to read your paper. As Americans we want to fight all hypocrites, and at the same time we are against persecution.

Truly yours, L. WEINBERGER

WORCESTER, MASS., May 23, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, to be sent to George H. Noble.

I have been lending him my papers, and he is very liberal, and when he saw the "Pictorial Text-Book" he thought he must have it. The book came all right yesterday, and I am very thankful for it.

I am doing all the good I can with what material I have to work with, and I may be able to do more in the future; it is very much needed in this priest-ridden city.

Yours ever for the truth,

MR. EDITOR: At last by dint of much toil and perseverance I have succeeded in getting a little money, and hasten to forward you your dues, with another year's subscription, and am sorry that I cannot send for some books, as well as for not being able to send something to the Wise and Fleckten funds, which I hope to do before it is too late. Let me thank you for your kindness for what has passed, and assure you that I will be with you as long as life lasts this old heretic. Wishing you and the grand old TRUTH SEEKER much success and pleasure, I am yours to command,

GILMAN, ILL., May 32, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: My paper did not arrive Saturday as usual, and I have felt ever since as if I had slipped a cog. Things do not go right if I fail to read it, and, as I am one of the two thousand or more that are back on subscription, I have thought may be you might have cut my name off, which would serve me just right. But I want you to put me right on again for two years, and be sure to send me last week's and this week's issue, and please send me Ingersoll's "About the Holy Bible." Those "Observations" are worth more than the price of the paper, and I don't want to miss a single one of Putnam's letters.

MR. I also take pleasure in handing you a "trial trip" subscription from Hiram McClure, who was a reader of your paper during the life of its founder, and a regular attendant of the meetings of the state association in those early days.

Franklin Steiner gave us a splendid lecture a short time since. We made a big effort to get the people out, and a good house was the result. Four clergymen were present, and two of them found little to criticize. The Methodist Episcopal dominion answered him the next Sunday but one. I published his sermon, to which Mr. Steiner replied through the paper, and there it ended. One round is all the average clergyman will stand up and receive. Mr. Steiner is indeed an able speaker, and we feel that the cause of humanity was advanced by his visit.

With best wishes for THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am, Yours, etc., W. W. AMES.

ATLANTA, GA., May 18, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.80, for which please send me a copy of the Koran; THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months, and three copies of "Bible Against Itself."

I would be glad if you would give me the figures as to the number of inhabitants on the globe, and what per cent of them are Christians. You can do this through the paper if you like. I saw an account published by a Methodist paper claiming that out of 1,400,000,000 in the world, the Christians had two-thirds of that number. I am well pleased with the "Age of Reason."

Respectfully, W. R. RAY.

[The Methodist editor drew on his vivid imagination for his facts. The Quarterly of the American Statistical Association for March, 1892, contained the results of the investigations of M. Fournier de Flaix, showing that out of a total world population of about 1,400,000,000, Christianity claimed 447,000,000, or nearly thirty-two per cent. That is, less than one-third as against the two-thirds claimed by the Methodist sheet. But this gives the Christian church the advantage of including in its membership all the Infidels of Europe, America, Australasia, and India, and the great mass of indifferents in all so-called Christian communities.—ED. T. S.]

Tar and Feathers vs. Arguments.

TURNER, OR., May 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: At last, we have had a new sensation in the sleepy priest-ridden little village of Turner. We have had a Free-thought lecture here.

Mrs. Katie Kehm Smith, secretary of the Oregon State Secular Union, spoke here last night on "Special Providence and the Evolution of the God Idea."

She had a fair audience, considering the priest-fostered condition here; but very few churchites were in attendance. The lecturer is a little bit of feminine loveliness, with "go" and "brains" enough to endow about forty ordinary "preachers," and is by far the most accomplished elocutionist this place has ever heard. It looked very like "casting pearls before swine" for her to speak here; but she did, and the Jesusites are all torn up over it.

One enthusiastic disciple with more religion than brains said that she "ought to be tarred and feathered, by jingo." And he doubtless voiced the secret thought of his colleagues. As usual, personal invective and animadversion take the place of any effort at reply to argument, but the orthodox are not happy.

One-fourth the effort put forth to build up secular churches that is now used to sustain orthodox Christianity would soon leave the latter far behind, to be eventually absorbed altogether. It is to the interest of Freethinkers to sustain this move. It means better, honest, and more stable government and advancing civilization.

ALBIA, IA., May 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Why is it that an old cracked cast-iron bell must be rung three consecutive times, and as often disturb the peace, before people can remember that they are expected to go to church? It does not require any of this heathen monkey work to get people to go to a theater. There is never any of this switch-engine, fire-alarm business when a circus comes to town, yet every elder and sister in the good cause is always on hand before the grand entree. We have noticed that whenever there is a prize fight, no matter how much pains the principals take to keep it quiet, there are always enough on hand to make the thing pay. No bell is rung to call men to a lodge, yet there is generally a quorum present. If Mrs. Smith-Jones is to give a 5 o'clock tea one day next week, everyone will be there on time, and no nerve-shattering, ear-splitting curfew must ring to tell them when to take a last look in the glass and start. Then why is it that a person who wants to take a little rest on Sunday morning—the only time that many people have to rest—must be disturbed three different times at inconvenient intervals by the discordant clanging of three or thirty old pot-metal bells cast after the pattern of sixteen centuries ago, and paid for by some lottery scheme of the faithful? I say why is this? There is no reason for it, except that it is customary. Let the church bell go along with the whipping-post, the rack, the iron maiden, the stake, and other implements of religious torture.

What Does Prayer Avail?

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., May 21, E. M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: What is the use of praying to God, if there be a God such as Jews and Christians claim? That is, admitting for the sake of the argument that there is a God, and only one God, who is the supreme ruler of the universe, who gives life and motion and light and heat (which are correlativ forces with electricity) and that he (we speak in the masculine gender because that is the custom of God worshippers) is all-wise and therefore never can err or make a mistake in anything he says or does, and is possessed of unlimited power to do right, and, therefore, will do only that which his wisdom directs. If he did otherwise it would prove he is not all-wise or else his power is limited. Now it is taught that he is omniscient and can foresee future events. If that is so, in conjunction with his wisdom and power, I don't see how anything can come to pass or transpire that he does not wish. And, moreover, he must be as represented by some true believers, unchangeable. But man is fallible and liable to err in judgment (and necessarily in action); then why does he try to either direct or even make a request, since he may be asking something that could not be granted by God unless he is fallible? Nor is this all, for God is sure to act just the same whether he is prayed to or not, otherwise he is not all-wise, or else he is not all-powerful, and therefore is not God. You may quote from that inspired book and tell me that the prayer of the righteous availeth much, or many other passages that teach us to pray, but still the question arises after every quotation, How can God answer prayer and yet be the all-wise, all-seeing, all-powerful being that we have been taught he is? But to reconcile this discrepancy is not incumbent upon the Atheist, because he admits this hypothesis only to show the absurdity of the theory, and if he was asked to explain these contradictions he would probably reply that he did not have any evidence that there was such a God nor that he had made a holy revelation to man, and therefore had probably been assuming too much, for such a God is unthinkable and therefore the hypothesis is probably incorrect. And it is unintelligible to say that within a few (or many) thousand years, God spoke this universe into existence—"And God said, Let there be light, and there was light"—and for an eternity previous to that little speech, there was nothing but all-wisdom and all-power, "And darkness was upon the face of the deep," if anyone can tell what that means. And if no one can tell what it means so that all shall agree, then shall all such ambiguous language be called revelation?

GEO. F. ELLIOTT.

He Sees the Danger of Intolerance.

SKULL VALLEY, ARIZ., May 10, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I perceive in one or more of the numbers sent me that you are in quest of funds like all the rest of us. I have always been of the opinion that THE TRUTH SEEKER was a big paying institution, but I see you have "to put on a poor mouth" now and then.

I send herein $1, in either gold-dust or stamps, to continue my subscription after the poem deal expires. I thought, then, you got it too cheap, but I think now that I have the best of the trade so far, even if the coming numbers are blank. There have been some years when I did not pull well in what I considered a "so-called" Freethought harness, but since reading your paper for some time I think you have put a new collar on me that don't chafe and gall, and I feel that I can, will, and must pull, or the "black-snake" of my conscience will make the fur fly from my sinful soul's hide.

This language may be a little too figurative for you, but I guess your "Observationist" will comprehend, for I see he has studied Old Saxon English, Hebrew, Chinoook, and the Apocalypse, and, therefore, ought to be able to bring an Arkansas preacher's sermon to the understanding of a jack rabbit if need be. But I did not mean to take up space writing what I have written. I wanted to commend and encourage you for your valiant words in behalf of true justice, when you demand that the Adventists shall not be persecuted, but granted their constitutional right; that Catholics shall not be forced to have their children taught anti-Catholic doctrines in the schools, and when you "round up" Catholics when they try to steal public funds to teach their foolishness with, you are right again; and when you bring up Liberals to the scratch who profess illiberal liberality, you are more than right—you are bully. It was this illiberal liberalism that used to "set me to bucking and busted my sinch." In the language of one who could give even George Washington a pointer on goodness, I say: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant; inasmuch as thou hast been faithful with a few [subscribers] thou shalt be ruler over many."

If we have any sense, reformers must support their papers. I remember John Swinton's Paper. In it the laboring people had a champion equal to any. They let the paper die; look at their condition now! So will it ever be. There are questions before us that are rapidly becoming conditions; we cannot shirk them without ruin. It is our duty, if there is a spark of courage left, to meet them. I say this in the face of the fact that I don't believe in liquor and tobacco in any form, and never use them. There are some things that are of more moment than personal habits, beastly though they be. Liberty, equality, and justice before the law "for all hands and the cook" first, last and all the time.

Without (the hope of) these life is worthless. And I am not a suicidist (beg G. E. M.'s pardon) either. An exemplary slave can be only what his master wills; a beastly free man can reform.

I thought I would write only a little when I began. I see I have overdone it. "Diggings" are not the best, and the only way I can get back the time I lost on this letter is to get THE TRUTH SEEKER outfit to pray for my prosperity, or for better eyes and judgment about this gold-finding business. Golly! wouldn't it be fun to see the heavenly hosts about that time! I fear they would forget your neighbor, Father Drumgoole, in the excitement, and not put the necessary virtue in his goods that day. H. G.

Another Woman Crazed by the Bible.

PIERSON, IA., May 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I clip the inclosed letter from the Sioux City Daily Journal of the 17th inst. The journal has the largest circulation of any daily in Iowa. And a Christian lady of this town says, "No doubt hundreds of good people will take this all in, as the true solution of the cyclone problem." You see it is all based on the Holy Bible.

You must understand that the recent "twister" in this vicinity was especially malevolent, one poor woman being bruised almost past recognition, every vestige of her clothing stripped from her body, and even the flesh torn from her limbs, so that they fell from their sockets when the body was raised from the ground.

Mrs. Meech says some people accuse God of this diabolical business. And the Methodist preacher of this town says that Mrs. Meech, no doubt, has a spite against some one whom she wants "cut off;" that most of the old-time witch killing was because somebody wanted an enemy put out of the way. It may be difficult to determine whether Mrs. Meech is a consistent Christian or a murderess in embryo. But if both hypotheses lead to the same result, what difference does it make? In either case, you Eastern people who enjoy the rare sport of turning these terrible "twisters" loose on the unsuspecting West had better beware of Mrs. Meech, lest she drop down on you unawares, and out you off utterly. It may be you did not intend to hurt anybody, as Mrs. Meech kindly intimates, but that collusion with the Presbyterian church at Le Roy, Minn., looks suspicious. If you did not know the nature of a "twister," you knew the nature of the Presbyterian church.

Just the old-fashioned plain cyclone was bad enough, without steeping it in the witch-broth of premeditated Presbyterian vindictiveness, punctuating it with infant damnation, and aggravating it with fore-ordained devilment.

Anyway, there seems to be plenty of work for Freethinkers yet, whether we think of Mrs. Ruth E. Meech, or the Sunday-school hot-beds that breed such lunatics. S. F. BENSON.

Postmaster Nash is in receipt of the following letter, which requires no explanation or elucidation:

DECORAH, May 14, 1895.

POSTMASTER—Dear Sir: I have read about the terrible cyclone in your vicinity. I am not acquainted with any person; I will write to the postmaster.

I visited Le Roy, Minn., after the cyclone last fall, and told the people of Le Roy the cause of cyclones; also offered to take part in the work of tracing out the cause to the starting place, which I believe to be in Canada East. I am a descendant from two lines of old prophets. It has been revealed to me that cyclones are caused by the work of witchcraft in the northeast. I cannot tell what people are practicing those arts till I go and find them. I know some of the people south of Le Roy that are sources for that spirit that causes these terrible storms. I believe they are innocent of the intention of doing harm. Some one East belonging to the witchcraft power has married into their family, which I believe were associated with the prophets. This witchcraft power has got their spiritual bodies under control, and they are used as sources for the witchcraft spirit. Also the Presbyterian church of Le Roy is controlled by some power that co-operates with the works of the cyclone. To the natural eye the church is all right; there is so many people joined the Presbyterian church that are controlled by this witchcraft power till it is having a sad effect. One of the people that is a source for the witchcraft spirit lives in Mason City, where the cyclone started from last fall. The other one lives south of Le Roy somewhere.

It has been revealed to me the head and cause of those terrible storms were in Canada East. The effects and spirit from the works found a source through the Presbyterian church of Le Roy, also a few people scattered around, some in Dakota. I believe all these people came from the northeast. I believe this work is associated with the old Jesuits that are located in the northeast. I could not be sure till I went and searched for the head of the stream. It was revealed to me there was a living spirit maturing from the works of destruction. It had the head of a small beast and human body. There is two powers, man and beast, united in the work. This living spirit represents two powers in one spirit. The larger this spirit grows the more power cyclones will have. I told the people of Le Roy they would always exist till the source for this spirit was traced back to the head and causes out off. The Bible teaches there will be witchcraft in the latter day that will be utterly out off. They never will be cut off till man roots out the cause of this destructive spirit.

I have written to many of the churches. They, like the people in the days of Noah, seem to be quite indifferent. Some of them think it is God that is sending these storms. The great God always provides some way to serve his people if they will have faith to take up the work. I would have to go to Le Roy and examine the Presbyterian church, also have to go to Canada and find the causes. I have also learned the dragon has made his way from the north into Le Roy, Minn. I have not learned that he gets his power through powers described or not. I have offered to make the attempt to cut off those powers if I can have my expenses paid and a little besides. I believe the work can never be done by any other person.

MRS. RUTH E. MEECH.

Bible's God Worse Than Jesse James.

LA HOYT, IA., May 6, E.S. 295.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5, for which send me THE TRUTH SEEKER another year, "Dynamic Theory," "All About the Holy Bible," and the ANNUAL.

I have been a member of THE TRUTH SEEKER family for over three years, and I can say that I am much pleased with the paper. I admire the sledge hammer blows its writers give to superstition. I have been a Freethinker nearly all my life, but never knew of your paper till a little over three years ago. I am a farmer, and was born on the farm that I now own. Was raised among waving fields of wheat and corn, forests, birds, and flowers, and, from a close study of nature, became a doubter when very young. I did my own thinking; did not permit others to think for me. Years ago the question arose in my mind, Where did God stay before he created space? I arrived at the conclusion that space always was and always will be; was not created, and cannot be destroyed; had no beginning and will have no end; has no top, no bottom, no sides, and no corners, but extends forever in every direction. Reason revolts at the idea of an end to space. I long ago arrived at the conclusion that the atoms of which all material bodies are formed always existed and always will exist.

Worlds, and systems of worlds, have been formed from atoms that have always existed somewhere in this boundless space. Is there any power outside of nature? The person who thinks there is had better first find an outside to nature. Nature is constantly building up, and just as constantly tearing down. But there is not so much as one atom destroyed. When we put a stick of wood or chunk of coal in the stove and burn it, to be sure it is destroyed in the form of wood or coal, but the atoms of which it was composed exist in other forms; they have not been destroyed. Everything that lives dies—animals, plants, trees—all die, decompose, and return to their original elements, or the elements they were in at one time (just the same as steam returns to water), and nature, when she rebuilds, calls on those elements for material from which to reform or rebuild. Without decay there could be no growth. We all know that there is generation after generation on this earth; the new is constantly taking the place of the old in vegetable as well as in animal life, and as all progressive thinkers admit that there is no power known to man that will form something from nothing, we are forced to the conclusion that it is the old that is regenerated or reformed. We all know that a few short years ago, we did not exist in bodily form; but we are satisfied that we now do exist in that form. Where, and in what form, were our bodies five hundred years ago? Surely the atoms of which our bodies are formed existed somewhere in earth, air, and water. We were in those elements at one time; now we are in bodily form. Our bodies will return to those elements again, and why not to bodily form again. Surely what nature has done, she can and will do again.

I will give a few reasons why I do not take any stock in the Christian God or his holy word. I cannot worship such a God as we read about in Numbers xxxi, or the book of Joshua, or any of the other books of the old Jewish Bible, for if his own word can be relied on he was worse than the outlaw Jesse James ever was, for who ever heard of the outlaw butchering, or giving orders to butcher, innocent mothers and babies? In Num. xxxi, 17, 18, the Lord commanded Moses to kill all the mothers and male babes, and debauch the daughters of a certain race of people. He also gave orders to Moses to kill all the kings, burn all the cities, and take all the gold, cattle, etc., of the Midianites and give to the priests. The priests then divided the plunder and the Lord got a share of it, even to thirty-and-two of the unmarried daughters. Can any sensible person read Numbers xxxi and believe it to be the inspired word of a good, just, and merciful God? Just think of it—a good, just, merciful God here gives orders to Moses to burn, kill, steal, and then to divide the plunder with himself.

In Genesis some writer is made to say that God created the heavens and the earth. I would like to be informed by some one as to which one of the man-made gods built this great boundless universe. Was it the Jewish God of the Old Testament, or the half man and half ghost of the New? Was it the Persian god, or the Mohammedan god, or was it John Chinaman's god, or the unlocated god of nature? Some one who was at the creation, I suppose, kept a record of all that God was doing, or did God keep the record himself? If he did, he should have signed his name to it before he passed it down to his children, so that they would know that it was genuine. I am satisfied that all gods are man-made, that they never existed except in the minds of the ignorant and superstitious and on paper. There has been a certain class in nearly all ages of the world that has been busy making gods, hellas, and devils, and for what purpose but to scare a living out of the credulous and ignorant masses? They go around over the country peddling futures of which they know nothing, but trade promises of a happy life after the people are dead for this world's goods; they are smart enough to take their part of the trade here and now, in gold dollars, silver dollars, paper dollars, gorgeous temples, and fine clothes. But the poor deluded fellows that they trade with have to wait till the next world for their part of the trade, and yet there are thousands with "wonder's open mouth" ready and waiting to make such foolish trades. I hope I may never be so foolish as to give a minister cool, hard dollars here and now for his part of the trade, and then wait till the next world for my part of it.

Preachers and priests hold up a terrible hell before the eyes of the people for the purpose of scaring them into the church, where they draw their attention up to their imaginary Jesus with one hand while, with the other hand, they go down into their pockets after good hard cash.

How much better is that way of getting money than the way that the highway robber gets it—by holding a cocked revolver to his victim's head? In either case there is a threat of total destruction in order to get money.

Christians profess to love their enemies, while, at the same moment, Christians and Christian nations are waiting for a ghost of an excuse to butcher each other with Gatling guns and canister—yes, force even the Infidels to hand over some of their hard-earned cash to build great war ships and load them down with rapid fire, Gatling, and dynamite guns, and other instruments of destruction with which Christian nations express their love for one another.

The road over which the church has traveled is strewn with the charred bones of millions of human beings; this plainly shows us how the church has loved her enemies. E. E. WHITE.

Something QUITE NEW & UNIQUE

THE BETTER WORLD

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dived into the future, far as human eye could see, saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

So said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Thy Wandering Boy.

'Tis years since I have left thy care
To brave whatever my lot might be;
With joyful zeal to do and dare
The world in life's fierce battle fray;
I left thy side in youthful joy,
Thy stalwart, stubborn, hopeful boy.

When deepens strife in battle's van,
The soldier heeds no blythe call;
So I, urged on by thoughtless clan,
Forgot the things that thee appall;
But I forsook all reckless joy,
To feel myself again thy boy.

Now oft the world seems dark and drear,
I scarcely heed its bitter scorn;
I feel thy tender love and care
For me o'er desert breezes borne;
I know thy sweet maternal joy
Will ever claim me for thy boy.

Ah, mother, hast thou wondered how
It came we ne'er again did meet?
I had no laments on my brow;
Could place no trophies at thy feet.
I could not bring thee hope and joy;
I stayed thy wandering, wayward boy.

—H. G.

Somebody Has Blundered.

In my studies (I am still going to school, though fourteen years of age) I have seen it stated that Mount Ararat is 17,000 and Mount Everest 29,000 feet in height. Natural history tells me that at an elevation of 14,200 feet the temperature of the atmosphere is perpetually freezing. Is not that a mistake? How could Noah's Ark rest on Ararat if there were 15,000, or even 2,800, feet of ice there? Of course, Noah's God could endow the dove with power to bore its way down through such a "sheet" of ice, and dive nearly three miles through water to get the olive leaf (olives growing in semi-tropical valleys), then swim back, find its hole of egress, climb out, and, with a proud obeisance, present the leaf to Noah. Olive-trees might bear leaves after ten or eleven months' of frigid submersion—perhaps! If the "Extracts from Noah's Log," in THE TRUTH SEEKER, by Mr. Robertson, be true—and they are, doubtless, as well authenticated as are scriptures generally—you will excuse my "perhaps." I feel sorry the Bible narrative did not tell us what became of Noah's raven. "Perhaps" it flew away to some one of the Himalayan peaks not covered by the ice, there found coal—there being no wood at such an elevation—built a fire, warmed its toes, sailed off to China or Egypt, where they have no record of a flood, and died happy.

There are in my school books so many passages conflicting with and positively contradicting those which I find in the Holy Bible that I am mentally bewildered. I wish, Miss Wixon, that you would guide me out of this wilderness. For instance, Bayard Taylor and other travelers say that they saw along the river Nile monuments bearing inscriptions dating back from eleven to fourteen thousand years; historians gravely declare it as fact that the Egyptians have, or had, an unbroken history of their people for 22,000, and the "heathen Chinese" for 26,000 years. Geologists assert that the various strata of earth, of stone, of coal, and of meteoric deposition shown by the Grand Canyon of Colorado river in Arizona, prove conclusively that our globe has had existence for more than twenty-one millions of years; and then, to cap the climax, astronomers emphatically asseverate that there are myriads of stars (suns) whose light, darting through space with a velocity of 187,000 miles per second, requires unknown millions of years to reach us!

Good gracious! Why, my Bible—which I was taught in Sunday-school never to question—contains no account of anything more ancient than six or seven thousand years! Is it not thousands to millions that somebody has blundered?

Yours for truth, HELEN REY HENRY.

Correspondence.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., May 22, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: We are having a rainless season out here, and everything is dry. The oats are all burning up. Yesterday was my brother's birthday. He is three years old. Our baseball season has opened, and I am going to get up a nine. My school was out about two months ago. We have about fifty acres of corn, which is doing well, considering the weather.

LACELLE, IA., May 11, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Corner. I go to school, and I am ten years old. My pa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and likes it very well. My grandpa, F. J. Emery, was a writer for this paper when he was alive; he was a great worker in the Liberal cause. I study reading, spelling, geography, and arithmetic, and take music lessons. My music teacher is a very pious lady, but does not give me pious lessons. I suppose she sees too many TRUTH SEEKERS in our house. I enjoyed playing the music in THE TRUTH SEEKER. When Mr. Remsburg lectured here we went to hear him and had a good time. I wish he would come again. I have only one brother. I like to read the Corner, and would be glad to correspond with any little writer in it. I remain,

Your friend, EDNA EMERY.

[Study hard, Edna, and learn all you can. We can never learn too much of that which is good and useful.—ED. C. C.]

LAWRENCE, KAN., May 20, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I see sunny Kansas needs a hearing occasionally, and I take it upon myself to be its reporter. Mr. John E. Remsburg, the eloquent Liberal orator, gave us a treat yesterday in the way of a lecture, entitled "Church Morality," which was well received by the small audience, and was followed by a lively discussion, in which many wide-awake people participated. Long may Mr. Remsburg live to spread the light. The spread of Liberalism is marked throughout the Western country, and a general evolution is taking place in religion. The active preacher is busy trying to patch up the Bible, and make it readable, in order to keep a congregation, but one by one his flock diminishes; so he loses courage, and sends for a revivalist to come to his rescue. And then he regains a few for the time being, but when the "craze," as it might be termed, is over, he loses them again. It is remarkable how few of the rising generation have tried to read the Bible. I say tried, because it is a most tedious job, but they just take it for granted that since their fathers and mothers were Christians, it is the right route, and they follow in their footsteps.

Now a few lines about Lawrence. It has 12,000 inhabitants, and is the seat of Douglas county. It is frequently called the Historic City, for the reason that in the year 1863 a band of desperadoes, led by a man named Quantrell, came from Missouri, and burnt the town and killed about one hundred and eighty people. On the 30th of this month the citizens are going to unveil a beautiful monument in honor of the slain.

The state university and Haskell Institute are located here. The latter is a training school for the Indians, and is supported by the government. At the present time there are about eight hundred pupils. They receive a thorough book learning, which, combined with a good trade, makes them well fitted to compete with their fairer brothers. Lawrence has the old Swedish windmill as a landmark. It is the first thing a traveler sees of Lawrence and the last thing. We have a number of your books, namely, "All in a Lifetime," "Apples of Gold," "Children's Hour," and "Right Living," all of which are excellent and reflect great credit on the author. "Right Living" is especially grand, as it points out the way to live, and if each one would try to follow it, this would be a better world. It is, indeed, the work of a truly noble and grand woman. We have given a copy to the city library. Hoping I have not taken too much of your valuable time, I will close, wishing yourself and the Corner prosperity. I am,

Your Liberal friend,

BLENDIA PALM.

[We are glad you had opportunity to listen to Mr. Remsburg. He is one of the most fearless and noble of Liberal workers.

Thanks for your appreciation of our work and for your most interesting and inspiring letter.—ED. C. C.]

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. By the census of 1890, the above is the value of
Church Property
in the United States.
Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?
REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.
Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to wealth of the leading Denominations and Denominations. Groups. Also, much other matter of special interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.
This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.
By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

OF Freethought
By Samuel Porter Putnam
Large Octavo, 1165 pp., Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. $5.
With The Truth Seeker for One Year, $6.50.
141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!
Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.
THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.
As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.
Price, $5. With "The Truth Seeker" One Year, $6.50.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES.
A new edition of that splendid prose poem "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt beveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

Gems of Thought.

It is never by metaphysics that you will succeed in delivering men from error; you must prove the truth by facts.—Voltaire.

LET Whitman advise you clearly of this—that there is one question of greater import to you than that of the public possession of capital and land: That of the private possession of yourself.—John Trevor.

ARE there not enough known facts to teach our children that would interest and benefit them? Cannot children be brought together on Sunday and have a good time, and be taught truth and sense instead of lies and nonsense?—Katie Kehm Smith.

IF the desire for that homage which wealth brings is the chief stimulus to these strivings after wealth, then the giving of this homage (when given, as it is with but little discrimination) is the chief cause of the dishonesties into which these strivings betray mercantile men.—Herbert Spencer.

IT is hardly necessary to warn people against standing on pillars or walking on peas; yet we do still find some who think themselves bound to abstain from certain enjoyments simply because they like them; and it may be as well to remind such that they are on the negativ road—the road to the desert, to negativ selfishness, to the emptying of life of its interests.—J. S. Mackenzie.

EVERY year, indeed, messengers are sent into all the world, who, under the protection of the church, in the most shameless manner, and speculating on the basest side of human nature, preach a crusade against whatever may be called freedom of mind or thought, enlightenment, culture, etc. Yet all these are only the convulsiv movements of an antiquated colossus, whose blows, even in its death struggles, may indeed be dangerous, but can never gain the victory.—Dr. F. C. C. L. Buchner. We hope that its ultimate defeat is certain.

WHEN Voltaire came to this "great stage of fools," his country had been Christianized—not civilized—for about fourteen hundred years. For a thousand years the religion of peace and good-will had been supreme. The laws had been given by Christian kings, and sanctioned by "wise and holy men." Under the benign reign of universal love, every court had its chamber of torture, and every priest relied on the thumbscrew and rack. Such had been the success of the blessed gospel that every science was an outcast.—Ingersoll.

THERE are questions before us that are rapidly becoming conditions; we cannot shirk them without ruin. It is our duty, if there is a spark of courage left, to meet them. I say this in the face of the fact that I don't believe in liquor or tobacco in any form, and never use them. There are some things that are of more moment than personal habits—beastly though they be. Liberty, Justice, and Equality before the law for all, first, and last, and all the time. Without [the hope of] these life is worthless. An exemplary slave can be only what the master wills; a beastly free-man can reform.—Henry Gohrman.

IDEALISTS are surprised or shocked in the presence of seemingly erratic personal or popular action. An individual or a community appears to violate consistency or integrity. Have we penetrated to the elements that shaped the event? Had we been sufficiently acquainted with fathers and mothers, with race prejudices and delusions and illusions, with habits, with muscular and spiritual forces, with the size of an individual's salary, with the wages of workmen, with the sinecures and interests of aristocrats, and numberless other equally variegated but not useless considerations, we should have been able to predict infallibly what must be or have been done or spoken on any given occasion.—Horace L. Traubel.

ACCORDING to Mivart, to pull off the legs and wings of insects; to punch out a lobster's eye or tear off his leg; or to throw a bushel of live crabs into a kettle of boiling water could hardly be regarded as cruel. Such creatures suffer nothing, or next to nothing, from such treatment, their sensibility is so feeble. Even the squealing of the pig in the hands of his butchers is to be taken in a Pickwickian sense. According to Mivart, it don't mean that it hurts him much to be pounced upon by three or four strong men, thrown violently to the ground, held there, and have his throat cut! The society for preventing cruelty to animals is evidently a mistake. Mivart is trying to make good this claim of benevolence for the Supreme, and to such "lame and impotent conclusions" does it bring him.—John Francis Smith.

CHRISTIANITY A REWARD FOR CRIME Authenticated by the Bible. O B Whitford, M.D.

DID MAN FALL? Is the Garden of Eden a Fact? Israel W Groh.

EPIDEMIC DELUSIONS. A Lecture by Frederic R. Marvin, M.D. Giving reasonable reasons for Religious and other Delusions.

FALSE CLAIMS OF THE CHURCH. John E. Remsburg's most noted work, and one of the most effective ever written by any Freethinker.

FIRST EPISTLE OF BENNETT THE APOSTLE TO THE TRUTH SEEKERS.

Written while journeying in and near the land of Yahweh. Containing the best moral instructions of the world from the great teachers of the former ages. D M Bennett.

THE GIANT DELUSION. A paper read before the Freethought International Congress at Chicago. One of Otto Wettstein's fraternal attacks on Spiritualism.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY. To which is added a poem on Thomas Paine. One of Samuel P. Putnam's most brilliant lectures. Every Christian who asks the idiotic question, "What Has Infidelity Done?" should be induced to read this book, if he has to be paid to do it.

HOW CAN WE BE SAVED? Was Jesus Supernaturally Conceived, and did he Rise from the Dead? Israel W Groh.

INGERSOLL AND JESUS. Showing how the two agree. A poem by Samuel P Putnam.

THE LIMITATIONS OF TOLERATION. A discussion between Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic R. Condit, Ex-Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, before the Nineteenth Century Club of New York. "Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him." Colonel Ingersoll maintains this, the others deny it. Mr. Condit is a Roman Catholic, Mr. Woodford a Protestant.

MATERIALISM: Its History, and Its Influence Upon Society. Dr. Louis Buchner.

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE WORKERS. A Consideration of the Marvels and Miracles of the New Testament. One of John Peck's best books.

MOSES BEFORE THE COURT, or The Forgery of the Old Testament. Dedicated to the Clergy. H. J. Seigneuret, M.D.

THE NEW GOD. "It is an open secret that man has always made his Gods. They exist in and through him, as the image exists in and through the mirror. Take away man and you take away God—the image vanishes." This pamphlet, therefore, is a consideration of what kind of a God man should make. Samuel P. Putnam.

ORTHODOXY. A lecture by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and one of that great man's best. The subjects considered are: Orthodox Religion Dying Out, Religious Deaths and Births, the Religion of Reciprocity, Mohammed, The Destruction of Art, The Discovery of America, Copernicus and Kepler, Charles Darwin, Special Providence, The Latest Creed, God as a Governor, The Love of God, The Fall of Man, The Atonement, The Second Birth, Insurrection, The Reign of Truth and Love, The Wars It Brought, The Resurrection, The Judgment Day, Pious Evasions, "No Bible, No Civilization," Miracles of the New Testament, The Ascension, Casting out Devils, Necessity of Belief, Eternal Punishment, Some who Are Damned, What I Believe, Immortality. This lecture is on the famous text, "The Clergy know that I know that they do not know."

PERSONAL EXISTENCE AFTER DEATH IMPROBABLE. L. R. Smith.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS MASS MEETING AT LINCOLN HALL, WASHINGTON. Being the Speeches of Hon. FREDERICK DOUGLASS and Col. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL on the Decision of the United States Court that the Civil Rights Act is Unconstitutional. Fifty-three large octavo pages, of which Colonel Ingersoll's speech occupies 38 pages.

PULPIT, PEW, AND CRADLE. So long as the Pulpit speaks to believing Pews composed chiefly of mothers, the cradle will be rocked by ghosts and the race will remain on its knees to a devil of its own creation and to a God who is powerless against him. One of Helen Gardener's brightest efforts.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY BETTER THAN ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. M. Babcock.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS. One of L. K. Washburn's best lectures, and it is, like all of his, very good.

THE ROARING LION ON THE TRACK. One of M. Babcock's comical sermons.

SCIENCE vs. RELIGION, or The Conflict Between Reason and Superstition. T O Widdicombe.

ST. MATTHEW BEFORE THE COURT. Presenting the evidence of the forgery of his alleged gospel. H J Seigneuret.

SISTER LUCY AND HER AWFUL DISCLOSURES REGARDING NEW HALL CONVENT. Showing that Convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom.

SPIRITUALISM FROM A MATERIALISTIC STANDPOINT. B F Underwood. Written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK. Torture Implements Employed in the 15th and 16th centuries for the promulgation of Christianity. Being the Nuremberg Collection, with specimens from the Holy Inquisition. 28 pictures. The descriptions and reflections by George E. Macdonald.

VICTOR HUGO'S ORATION ON VOLTAIRE, delivered on the one hundredth anniversary of Voltaire's death. Translated by James Parton, author of the Life of Voltaire. To which are added the three great poems of Goethe, George Eliot, and Longfellow.

WAS CHRIST CRUCIFIED? Austin Bierbower. A lawyer's consideration of the evidence of that alleged event.

WAS JESUS INSANE? A consideration of Christ's alleged acts which would lead one to that conclusion. L K Washburn.

WHY DON'T HE LEND A HAND? And other Agnostic Poems. Samuel P. Putnam. The title poem is perhaps the most popular of Mr. Putnam's many poems, and a great many editions of it have been called for. The other poems are: The Golden Age, The Ideal and the Real, Not Dead, but Living, Fruition, Hope, Thomas Paine, Nature's Gospel, Address to Deity, and the short poem so often recited with great effect by Charles Watts, Give Us Light.

WILL THE COMING MAN WORSHIP GOD? B F Underwood; written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

WOMAN: FOUR CENTURIES OF PROGRESS. A lecture delivered at the Freethinkers' International Congress at Chicago. Considering: The Cause of Woman's Subjugation, The Canon Law and Its Effects Upon Her, Theology Never Helpful to Woman, Invention Woman's Friend, Freethought the Benefactor of Woman. Susan H. Wixon.

WOMAN: HER PAST AND PRESENT, HER RIGHTS AND WRONGS. A lecture delivered before the Woman Suffrage Association of Denver, Col., by B F Underwood.

Containing the famous Christmas Sermon by Colonel Ingersoll, the protests thereby evoked from the ministers who think they own this country and all therein, and Colonel Ingersoll's replies to the same. A finely gotten up pamphlet. Price, 25 cents.

Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

LINCOLN

This is Colonel INGERSOLL's great lecture, printed in a handsome pamphlet, and containing the Century's famous portrait of Lincoln—said to be the best extant. Price, 25 cents.

SHAKSPERE

"An intellectual ocean, whose waves touched all the shores of thought." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with likeness of Shakspeare from the Kesselstadt death mask. Price, 25 cents.

PIANOS, PIANOS!

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STRECK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

TALMAGE lectured some seventeen years ago in Aberdeen, Scotland. A calico placard outside the hall read thus:

"To-night! To-night!
A Lecture by the Great Dr. Talmage.
The Word of God is Free to All!
Admission 4s., 3s., 2s., and 1s."

THERE are other versions of the story of Joseph and Potiphar's wife than the orthodox and generally accepted one. The following is attributed to M. de Lesseps: When Potiphar's wife was accused by her husband of having forgotten her marital vows for the sake of Joseph, she attempted no denial, but merely said that Joseph's beauty was so great that any other woman would have done the same thing. This she offered to prove, and having assembled all the young ladies of the Egyptian court, she placed them in a row with their eyes turned toward the door of the apartment. In the hands of each girl she put an apple and a knife, and told them to cut the apple when the signal was given. By prearrangement the door suddenly opened, and Joseph appeared in all his beauty. Potiphar's wife gave the signal at that moment, and every girl save one, instead of cutting the apple, cut her hand. The beauty of Joseph had so dazzled them that they were unable to take their eyes off him. It is needless to say that there was a general feeling that Potiphar's wife was quite excusable. The girl who showed her hands uncut, on being asked to explain, said that the instant she saw Joseph she felt that it was no longer safe for her to hold the knife, and she therefore hurled it from her before the signal to cut the apple had been given.—Estuary.

THE FATE OF PIOUS DAN.

"Run down and get the doctor quick!"
Cried Jack Bean with a whoop,
"Run, Dan, for mercy's sake be quick.
Our baby's got the croup!"
But Daniel shook his solemn head,
His sanctimonious brow,
And said, "I cannot go, for I
Must read my Bible now;
For I hav regular hours to read
The Scripture for my spirit's need."

Said Silas Gove to Pious Dan,
"Our neighbor, 'Rastus Wright,
Is very sick; will you come down
And watch with him to-night?"
"He has my sympathy," said Dan.
"And I would sure be there,
Did I not feel an inward call
To spend the night in prayer.
Some other man with Wright must stay.
Excuse me, while I go and pray."

"Old Briggs has fallen in the pond!"
Cried little Bijah Brown;
"Run, Pious Dan, and help him out,
Or else he sure will drown!"
"I trust he'll swim ashore," said Dan,
"But now my soul is awed,
And I must meditate upon
The goodness of the Lord;
And nothing merely temporal ought
To interrupt my holy thought."

So Daniel lived a pious life,
As Daniel understood,
But all his neighbors thought he was Too pious to be good.
And Daniel died; and then his soul,
On wings of hope elate,
In glad expectancy flew up
To Peter's golden gate.

"Now let your gate wide open fly;
Come, hasten, Peter. Here am I."

"I'm sorry, Pious Dan," said he,
"That time will not allow,
But you must wait a space, for I
Must read my Bible now."

So Daniel waited long and long
And Peter read all day.
"Now, Peter, let me in," he cried,
Said Peter, "I must pray;
And no mean temporal affairs
Must ever interrupt my prayers."

Then Satan, who was passing by,
Saw Dan's poor shivering form
And said: "My man, it's cold out here, Come down where it is warm."
The angel baby of Jack Bean,
The angel, 'Rastus Wright,
And old Briggs, a white angel, too,
All chuckled with delight;
And Satan said, "Come, Pious Dan,
For you are just my style of man."

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of his volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

AT ABOUT ONE-HALF VALUE.

A small farm of 10 acres 86 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water, good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes walk of the railroad station, 9 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes walk.

The place is specially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1,000 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest, overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

Address, DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, N. J.

Now Read This!
Dr. Fellows is a staunch LIBERAL and a very successful physician. He has treated DISEASES OF MEN for twenty years, and his remedies are an outgrowth of this long practice, which should give confidence to those afflicted.

"Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth" (Matt. v. 5.)
Very fine theoretically, but we notice the meek are always swindled out of their inheritance by brazen pietists.
"Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works, etc." This is contrary to the advice in Matt. vi. 3, to 6 where secrecy is advised.

"Whoever shall say, thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire."
Ah, there, Jesus! Be careful then yourself or I'll warn you up! You had a bad habit of calling folks fools yourself, you know. 'O ye fools,' etc. To believe all the prophets have spoken.
"If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out and cast it from thee," etc. "If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off and cast it from thee," etc. (Matt. v. 29, 30.)

This is not likely to be obeyed to any alarming extent, but if it is, what a precious lot of cripples and one-eyed saints there are in heaven! I'm glad they don't come to my place.

"Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away." To be sure! Give to every worthless bum and beggar till you are a beggar yourself! Holy Brimstone! what fine doctrine! "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, and do good to them that hate you," etc. — O Jesus, why don't you practice what you preach? Why do you not love and bless sinners and myself also? Why will you say: "Depart from me ye cursed," etc. to those who do not believe in you or to those who did not feed and clothe you, etc. O thou mythical son of a ghost, thou art very inconsistent — Yours &c. Satan. (See Matt. XXV, 41 to 46.)

CHRIST'S SERMON ON THE MOUNT EVIDENTLY PLEASETH SATAN.

News of the Week.

A SLIGHT earthquake shock was felt in Vermont on May 28.

REVOLUTIONS are reported as brewing in several of the Central American "republics."

THERE are grave troubles in the Korean cabinet, and the government seems to be on the verge of ruin.

REAR ADMIRAL JOHN J. ALMY, of the United States Navy, died in Washington in May, aged 80 years.

JOHN FORRESTER ANDREW, ex-Congressman, and son of John Albion Andrew, war governor of Massachusetts, died on May 29, aged 45.

THE Democratic state central committee of Kansas refuses to commit itself to an address in favor of the unlimited free coinage of silver.

A "HEATED term" began in the East on Decoration Day and continued for five days. The heat records for this season of the year have been broken.

In the Republican state convention, held on May 29, Gen. A. S. Bushnell, the candidate of the Foraker wing of the party, was nominated for governor, over Nash, representing the McKinley division.

A BOAT LOAD of nitro-glycerin exploded on the river at Parkersburg, W. V., on June 1. The property loss was immense, and several lives are already known to be lost, with the probability that more will be reported later.

ON May 30 the British consul and vice-consul, the Russian acting consul, and the French consular secretary were attacked and shot just outside the town of Jiddah, in Arabia, it is supposed by Bedouins. One was killed, the others wounded.

GUSTAV FREYTAG, the famous German novelist, poet, journalist, and dramatist, recently died. He was born at Kreuzburg and educated at the universities of Breslau and Berlin. Freytag was the great champion of the middle classes and mercantile life.

ON May 26 the Civic Federation of Chicago took in hand a large section of the business part of the city and gave the streets a thorough cleaning. The street cleaning department has not done the work efficiently for some time owing to red tape obstructions and lack of appropriations.

ON May 23 Shakspeare's "Merchant of Venice" was presented in the Methodist church at Cape May, N. J., by the students of the Cape May high school. The church was crowded. As the Methodist Discipline forbids the visiting of play houses this production may cause some trouble.

In the bye-election in Warwick and Leamington to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Speaker Peel of the Commons, Alfred Lyttleton, Conservative, was elected. Mr. Peel has been elected without opposition as a Liberal-Unionist.

The conservatives have gained in other bye-elections.

In Vienna the anti-Semitic agitation has led to rioting recently; Dr. Lueger, anti-Semite leader, was elected burgomaster, but by a majority so small that he refused to accept the place. This precipitated the rioting on the part of his followers. The chief supporters of this reactionary party are the small tradesmen and the clericals.

It is generally believed that there is such dissatisfaction in Japan over the way in which the European powers beat the government out of part of the fruits of the victory of the war with China, that the ministry will have to resign. Japan seems to be harried by a particularly malignant type of the swashbuckling jingo.

THE headquarters of the Knights of Labor are to be removed from Philadelphia to Washington, and they have already taken out a building permit. The change is made so that the order can watch Congress more closely. General Master Workman Sovereign says that Labor is dependent upon Congress for all improvement of its condition.

THE Pacific Mail steamship Colima was wrecked off the Mexican coast last week. The vessel appears to have been overloaded and the impact of a heavy wave caused part of the deck freightage to slip, sending the ship to the bottom, her boilers bursting as she lurched. Only 34 were saved out of a total of considerably more than 200, crew and passengers.

THE new Sunday closing barber shop law went into effect on June second. A large number of shops kept open and some arrests were made, but the offenders were generally released on their own recognizance. The police sympathize with the working barbers, and are not disposed to make arrests unless complaints are made. The complainants are the barbers who do not work, and who play the sneak on the workers.

COUNT CAMILLE MERCADEER, chief of the engineering department of Carnegie's Edgar Thompson Steel Works, has been chosen by the Austro-Hungarian government to superintend the construction by it of an immense steel plant in Cronstadt, to cost between $6,000,000 and $7,000,000. He has been with the Carnegies for five years and the notification reached him two hours after he had become a naturalized citizen of the United States.

In the House of Commons the government was asked if it was aware that thousands of commercial travelers from the United States and the continent were in the United Kingdom soliciting orders, and if the Board of Trade will confer with Sir William Harcourt as to the desirability of following the foreign practice of levying licenses upon them. The president of the Board of Trade, Mr. James Bryce, answered that requiring such licenses is impracticable, would only lead to reprisals and be very harmful to British interests.

At Boston on May 28 Judge Holmes in the Supreme Court held that strikers have the right to patrol in front of former employers' premises, provided they use lawful methods. They are also held to have the right of free competition, which carries with it free combination in a free commercial fight, subject to the rules of fair play. The decision grants an injunction limited to enjoining the defendants from interfering with the plaintiffs' business by obstructing any person in entering or leaving the plaintiffs' premises, or by intimidating any person who is, or hereafter may be, in the employ of the plaintiff. The case will be taken to the full bench of the supreme court.

EDITORIAL

From the Freethought Magazine.

"The advertisement of that well-known Freethinker and distinguished jeweler, Otto Wettstein, appears in our advertising pages. Mr. Wettstein is worthy of the patronage of the public. He is an honest man that can be trusted. Whatever he agrees to give you you are sure to get, as we have learned by experience. Brother Wettstein is doing grand, good work for the cause of Freethought, and is entitled to the consideration of the Liberal public."

The subject of the above eulogy claims no credit as a writer or scholar; his efforts in that line are crude, and simply the "Musings" of his few idle hours. But he does claim to be a first-class jeweler. Has worked at the bench for forty-five years; is a natural mechanic, art critic, acute judge of goods, close buyer, and does business on minimum degree of expense. His FREE-THOUGHT BADGE is conceded to be the most artistic and expressive emblem ever designed. His "OTTO WETTSTEIN" WATCH combines all the qualities of a first-class timekeeper at one-half the usual rates, and his COLONEL INGERSOLL SOUVENIR SPOON is without question, the finest specimen of the die-cutter's art ever produced. It is his aim now to establish himself as YOUR JEWELER.

A HOPELESS CASE—THE SITUATION WITH THE POOR CHRISTIAN (Companion to last week).

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

What a New Subscriber, Who Has Received His Pictorial Text-Book, Says of It.

LAMAR, Mo., May 8, 1895.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is received, and after a careful examination of the work I unhesitatingly pronounce it one of the most impressive Freethought works ever issued from the press. It will indeed "corner the parson" and all his flock, and I shall take great pleasure in showing the book to my orthodox friends. As a reference book it is invaluable, and it should find a place in every Freethinker's library.

Respectfully, W. F. BAILEY.

Christian Fear of the Truth.

A Quaker correspondent of a city paper, referring to the discussion of the alleged resurrection of Jesus precipitated by the sermon of Rev. Heber Newton, quotes this from the writings of William Penn:

"They [Friends] judge that a curious inquiry into those high and divine revelations, or into speculative subjects, though never so great truths in themselves, tend little to godliness and less to peace, which should be the chief aim of true Christians. . . . The sad consequences in all times of superfining upon scripture texts do sufficiently caution and forbid them. Men are to apt to let their heads outrun their hearts and their notion exceed their obedience, and their passion support their conceits; instead of a daily cross, a constant watch, and a holy practice."

Perhaps it is not strange that a religious system based on dreams and legends should discourage all investigation of its own foundations. Such is Christianity and such is its attitude. Catholic, Presbyterian, Methodist, Quaker, Universalist—all sects of the church instinctively fear examination and criticism. This shrinking from the bottom facts throws the suspicion of insincerity upon all their professions. If they really believed all that they claim to believe, would it be so difficult to get them to search for the roots of their faith, their book, and their church? If Christianity is in truth a revelation from a god of infinit knowledge, power, and goodness, what harm to it can come from a "curious inquiry" into any of its affirmations of fact, its dogmas, its ethical codes? Should its defenders not rather rejoice when such inquiry is essayed, for how can the questions and the uncoverings of finite man belittle or dim the eternal truth of the Infinite? The earnest student of science, the painstaking investigator of social phenomena, cannot, if he would, imitate the theologian—he must keep his eyes open, his mental faculties on the alert, his moral consciousness awake. He needs the truth, and the truth he must have if he would build solidly for the present and future. He must be ever receptive of new truths, or, rather, of the new interpretations of old truths which newly discovered facts render possible and imperative. He is a learner, an announcer, not a creed maker and enforcer. The religionist, on the contrary, believes, or believes that he believes, or pretends that he believes, that Christianity was delivered by God to the early church a perfect system of faith and practice, to attempt to improve which is nothing less than sacrilege and rebellion.

It is and must be because it was. This belief, or affected belief, paralyzes his brain and arms his hand with the sword of persecution.

William Penn thought that the first thing needed in the church was peace, the peace that precludes discussion, and no doubt he meant well, but he failed to perceive that such peace is stagnation and can only end in corruption and death. Like his fellow Christians of more orthodox sects, he was apprehensive of the operations of the human brain; he was afraid that men's skeptical heads would outrun their believing "hearts," and so he discounted all critical inquiry concerning the "divine revelations"; that is, concerning the so-called divine revelations in which he had been trained to believe, for it is not to be thought for a moment that he or any other genuine Christian would have a word to say against the "pagans and "heathens" investigating and rejecting their "divine revelations." That is another matter entirely. It is only in so far as his own inherited religion is involved that the Christian forswears reason and demands that all others do likewise. Does not this show that he has doubts of the quality of the masonry in the foundations of his temple—that he is himself a skeptic?

Demoralizing and Dangerous Laws.

All careful readers of history and close observers of contemporary events know that one of the most prolific causes of official corruption and tyranny has been and is the enactment of laws that disregard the fundamental, constitutional, or generally accepted rights of man. Officers charged with the enforcement of such statutes put them into effect or not, just as they feel disposed, and it does not take long for the venal among them to learn how to make the non-enforcement of these invasive edicts a source of revenue and to punish those who decline to contribute to their blackmail exchequers. Every city and town in the country has at some time in its history had experience of the degenerating effects of this kind of legislation, while with many the terrible evil is chronic. And yet the law-carpenters and the puritanic meddlers behind them do not seem to be capable of learning the simple lesson that should be self-evident to a school-child; they are unable to grasp the fundamental truth that the sole function of law is the protection of the citizen in the possession of his life, his person, and his property. Beyond this it can neither legitimately nor safely go; at the boundaries of this province it must stop or bring upon the individual and the state an unending train of evils. Look for a moment at one of the most conspicuous recent illustrations of the corrupting results of unnecessary and criminal legislation: For two years now this city has been in a ferment of agitation over the demoralization of the police force. The newspapers have fulminated; the preachers have stormed in their pulpits, and some of them have led in holy crusades; all sorts of reformatory organizations have been formed; the legislature has sent down investigating committees; there has been an almost complete municipal political overturning; police officers and higher officials have been indicted, tried, convicted, and others have been forced to retire on pensions; the legislature has enacted a number of new laws for the government of the city; the municipal boards have been reorganized, and now the police force is under the management of a new set of commissioners and a new chief. During this "regenerating" process some hundreds or thousands of poor and unfortunate people have been flayed in the amphitheater for the edification of sincere fanatics and pious hypocrites. Where are we now? What follows briefly answers the question.

1. The fact most prominently brought out by the work of the Lexow Committee was that, at a low estimate, nine-tenths of the demoralization in the ranks of the police and among the higher officials of the department was the necessary fruit, the inevitable result, of the endeavor to enforce-not-enforce laws personally distasteful to the great majority of the inhabitants of the city, however loudly a large contingent of this majority might clamor for them for the "other fellows" and "for appearance's sake."

2. After all this turmoil and struggle and vituperation and "reorganization," the Sunday excise laws are scarcely if any better enforced than under the old regime, although the new Acting Chief of police solemnly haranged his captains on their duty to see that the law was strictly obeyed. It is enforced in patches, chiefly in districts where the people are able to lay in Sunday supplies, and where, consequently, there is less imperative demand for an open day than there is in the more crowded sections of the city. But, taking the city over, the law is not now put into execution. Many of the policemen do not want to enforce it under any consideration, and others will not do so when it is tolerably safe to shut their eyes and open their hands. For this bringing of necessary defensive laws into contempt through association, and for this police bribery, unconstitutional, inequitable, and unsocial legislation is the sole cause. The first step toward real reform—not the sham "reform" of priests, hypocrites, and moral and social tinkers—is the repeal of the statutes which have made of the police force, and will make of every police force that can be organized or "reorganized," a blackmailing machine.

3. Did the lessons laid before the law-constructors and the people by the investigations of the Lexow Committee teach them anything? As regards the former, the only answer possible is an unqualified No. What effect these lessons had on the people remains to be seen, although their apathy when the repeal of the Sunday laws was up for discussion last winter would seem to indicate that they are still blind and deaf to their own interests. But for the people there is some excuse, for the newspapers of the state refused to let their readers see the arguments advanced by the Freethinkers against the continuance of our Puritan Sabbath legislation and, with the exception of the World, likewise refused to take up the righteous cause themselves. But for the members of the Assembly and of the Senate there can be no excuse except stupidity; we presented to each of them in documentary form unanswerable arguments for the repeal of the Sunday laws, and our representative pleaded with them to do justice and put the state in the vanguard of civilization by getting out of the light of the people. We showed them how these laws operated to demoralize the police and lead the unthinking and careless into the violation of the really justifiable laws of the state. It was all in vain. No attention was paid to fundamental principles, and even the partial and merely ameliorative measures offered by others were shelved at the behest of the ministers and their factions. Not only did the "reform" legislature refuse to seriously consider the repeal of the existing Sabbath laws, but it actually went so far in the way of reaction as to pass a law for the closing of barber-shops on Sunday, except in New York city, where they are graciously permitted to remain open until one o'clock in the afternoon. Here is one more law made for the police to coin money out of, if any barbers feel able to pay for the "privilege" of working on Sunday, and to enforce or not enforce as the whim of the moment may govern their conduct. It is now quite apparent that but few barbers wanted the law, but those who did were, as is usual in such cases, the persistent talkers, and as they played into the hands of the priests, and as the latter are supposed to be able to command a good many votes, the legislators gave them what they demanded, wholly regardless of the wishes, needs, and rights of the other barbers and of the people at large.

The new law was to become operative on Sunday, June 2d, and on that day it began to produce the effects characteristic of such statutes. In New York, on the East side, a majority of the shops were open until late in the afternoon. The barbers who observed the law—presumably because they did not wish to work anyway—watched those who did wish to work—and whose right to work, it is needless to say, is just as sacred as the right of the spies not to work—and lodged complaints at the police stations. In Brooklyn most of the shops were apparently closed, but some were frankly open, while a number of those ostensibly closed were in fact receiving customers on the quiet. One barber was arrested while shaving a man, but the customer protested so strongly against being sent away with one side of his face shaved and the other not, that the policeman allowed the job to be finished. This barber and his assistant were taken before Justice Walsh, who sent them home without bail, telling them to please call the next morning. Another workman was released on his own recognizance. One "law-abiding barber" was very indignant because the officer would not arrest the customer as well as the barber in another shop raided. The policeman said that the law did not make a culprit of the customer, which shows how far the New York Sabbatarians are behind those of Massachusetts and other states, where the new anti-Sunday amusement laws make it a misdemeanor to attend a theater or other place of entertainment (except the church) on Sunday. On one street are ten shops, some of which were open and some closed. The proprietors of the latter tried in vain to get the other workmen arrested; every time the police would rush for the shops a warning would precede them and the doors would be closed and barred when the officers arrived. Clubmen who desired the services of a barber called him to their parlors, where he could work in security. The World reports:

"The Brooklyn police are in sympathy with the barbers, and it is safe to say they will not voluntarily make one arrest. They made no attempt whatever to enforce the law, except when complaints were lodged, and generally gave the offending barber time to get wind of their coming and make himself secure."

That speaks pretty well for the Brooklyn police; it demonstrates that, no matter what a man's vocation, he need not make a complete sacrifice of his sense of right and of his respect for the liberty of his fellows. The justices, also, have no relish for the miserable little Puritan statute, and some of them do not scruple to let their views be known. Justice Steers said that he disliked the law, did not think that it was constitutional, and should exercise the privilege which the law gave him of suspending sentence for a first offense. Justice Walsh got out of the dilemma by declaring that he had only newspaper reports that the bill had become a law, and so he should discharge the prisoner brought before him. That is the way in which Sabbatarian legislation encourages the practice of strict veracity! In Jamaica, Long Island, a Mrs. Hohlein, who owns a shop in that village, was arrested for her failure to observe a law that is itself a crime. She is a widow and supports herself and her three children from the earnings of the shop. Most of her money is made on Sunday and she cannot afford to close on that day without going out of business, but she will be compelled to close, for she has not the means to fight the law. Justice Detheridge discharged her, on the ground that he had no official knowledge of the existence of the statute. Who will have the hardihood to affirm that this law is not a crime; and if it is a crime, what are they who demanded and enacted it? The answer is obvious and deserved. Americans! are you not ashamed to bring children to the verge of want because their mother has a vocation that requires her to do honest work on Sunday, the priest's day? Are you dead to every noble impulse? Have you forgotten every axiom and principle of freedom? Were the services and sacrifices of Paine, and Adams, and Jefferson in vain?

On June 7th the barbers of Brooklyn, to the number of a thousand or more, met in Arion Hall and raised a preliminary fund to take a case into court to test the constitutionality of the Collins law. A committee was appointed to confer with Judge Steckler, who holds the enactment to be unconstitutional. This is wise but carelessly tardy action; it is very much like shutting the stable door after the horse is stolen. Had these barbers and others of like mind bestirred themselves before the law was passed there is little doubt that it would have been defeated. Eternal vigilance is the cost of liberty. Had these men earnestly tried prevention there would, in all probability, have been no need of resorting to this expensive method of cure, and George Amberger, of No. 259 Devoe street, Williamsburg, would not now be in his coffin, murdered by priests and their dupes. This unfortunate man had been in poor health, business was dull, and Sunday was his one profitable day. The loss of his trade weighed on his mind and hope died. On Friday night he told one of his neighbors that he did not believe the law would be repealed, turned and entered the room in the rear of his shop, cut his throat with a razor, and died before the ambulance arrived. An Antony of liberty should deliver the oration at the funeral of this victim of ecclesiastical assassins.

In Buffalo many shops were open, as in Jamestown and Niagara Falls. In the latter place Sunday is the most lucrative day for the barbers, and they will not close unless compelled to do so by the authorities. It should be noted that it is as much an offense under the law to shave a man at his club or in his house as in the public shop. President Roosevelt of the New York Board of Police Commissioners announces that the law will be enforced in this city "to the letter."

And what will the journeymen barbers gain by the law, even if strictly enforced? In Brooklyn, in compensation for the half or three-fourths of a day's work on Sunday, very many of them have been getting a day off during the week. This they will lose. Those working in the shops that keep open all day Sunday will not only have to give their mid-week holiday in exchange for the Sunday holiday but are likely to find their wages cut in addition, for it is certain that with the shops closed on Sunday a great many men who now patronize them will do their own shaving. Thus it is indisputable that while the Collins law will not raise the wages of the journeymen it will decrease the revenues of the boss barbers and of those barbers who are their own employers. And hereafter no intelligent and conscientious friend of liberty will give his custom to a barber known to have worked for or favored the enactment of the Sunday closing law.

Let no one who reads this conclude that this is a matter that interests only the citizens of this state, or that it is only a trifling wrong against which we protest. The Sunday monopolists are active in every part of the country and they are weaving a net of these special statutes that is designed to hold in its meshes all the citizens of the republic and give to the priests the absolute monopoly of Sunday. The entire question of self-government is bound up in this issue, and we sleep on guard at our own peril.

The Case of Moses Harman.

Last week we gave the news of the resentencing of Moses Harman, editor of Lucifer, Topeka, Kan., to one year's imprisonment for sending the Markland letter through the mails. There is little additional information to be reported this week. All our old readers know that Mr. Harman was originally sentenced to five years in the penitentiary for this offense, the "Markland Letter" being a protest by a correspondent against a very atrocious case of assault, and the one objectionable term contained therein a Latin word in universal use in medical and surgical works and law books. After serving about a year, Mr. Harman was released on a writ of error granting him a new trial. The government delayed the trial, seemingly on purpose, but at last it was had, and now, after another long procrastination, Judge Phillips has handed down his decision. He holds that the first sentence imposed was not only illegal but absolutely void, and that the present is the original and only sentence. Of course, Mr. Harman's attorney will put this opinion to the severest tests, and he hopes to have the aged reformer soon in the free air again. In the meantime Mr. Harman's daughter, Mrs. Lillian Harman, has editorial charge of Lucifer, and the veteran Abner J. Pope handles the business end of the enterprise. It is hoped that the friends of the free press and mails will give Mr. Harman and his substitutes all the encouragement and assistance possible, for the new law proceedings will necessarily draw heavily on Lucifer's slender resources. Address either Mrs. Harman or Mr. Pope at 116 East Fourth street, Topeka, Kan.

The legislature of Tennessee refused to exempt the Seventh Day Adventists from the operation of the Sunday law of the state, the bill offered for that purpose being defeated by the vote of 57 to 24. The Adventists asked for equal justice, the friends of this bill offered them toleration, and the majority refused them even this counterfeit justice. Of course Tennessee is overwhelmingly Christian, Freethinkers being few and scattered and the state very largely rural.

T. Thomas Fortune, editor of the New York Age, says that the Negroes are doing nothing, outside of church work, to command the respect of mankind. He adds: "We spend so much time and money preparing to die that we neglect almost entirely the things of this life that make for power and responsibility." We should judge that the Negroes of America are now in about the same stage of development that the white inhabitants of Christian Europe were during the Dark Ages. At all events, they are similarly occupied, so far as their chief pursuit in life is concerned, if Mr. Fortune has not slandered them.

It is becoming quite a common occurrence for the churches to divide a city into districts, and appoint a manager for each district, who in turn appoints canvassers, the work of whom is to take a house to house census, filling out cards with religious statistics, which include the denominational membership, attendance upon services, Sunday-school attendance, and preferences expressed. The population is divided into three classes, children, youths, and adults. The work is contributory to that of the various church auxiliary societies. "The primary intent, however, is to show strangers and the unchurched the well-meaning interest of the churches in their welfare," says one of the promoters. "The data will not be misused." Nevertheless, we cannot resist the suspicion that it will be employed to help bring the odium theologicum to bear on those who avow themselves Freethinkers or who for other reasons do not attach themselves to the churches. On the surface it appears to be without directly evil intent, but as it is under the direction of aggressive Christians it will do no harm to keep a close watch upon it, for sad experience proves that it is almost impossible for these people to engage in any enterprise that is not intended to make it uncomfortable for dissenters to live in this world.

The Christian Advocate remarks that the preacher who is uncertain regarding the opening of art galleries on Sunday "does not intend to open the door for worldly pleasure-seekers to do as they please on the Lord's Day, but he does so without intending it." What slaves to superstition men are! Why should not worldly pleasure-seekers do as they please, providing that they do not invade the equal rights of others? The inference is that they ought to do as others please to let them do, but where do these ruling gentry get the right to prescribe for people whose natural and constitutional rights are presumptively equal to their own? If a group of men have not the right to govern themselves, where do they get the right to govern their neighbors? Again, why should not worldly pleasure-seekers do as they please on "the Lord's Day," so-called, as well as on other days? Who gave the "Lord" a proscriptiv right to the monopoly of any day? Who is this Lord? Where is he? How are we going to prove that he has a quit-claim deed for Sunday? Dr. Buckley knows just as well as we do that, so far as the authority of the Bible is concerned, Saturday is the real "Lord's Day." The men and women of America and of the rest of the world should stand on their feet and tell the priests and law-makers that "worldly pleasures" are all right; that the "Lord's Day" delusion is a survival from the rattle and bib stage of human development, and that each individual has the right to make such use of his time as he sees fit, always at his own cost. Genuin liberty is not given; it is won.

It seems so easy for some people to be inaccurate, and also oblivious of the most patent facts. For instance, there is an "Infidel" paper that comes to this office that in one issue twice speaks of the editor of this journal as "McDonald," although the name appears in ever number as Macdonald; once gives him the initials "H. E.," although they are plainly printed E. M., and speaks of the "London Freethought Magazine," although there is no London Freethought Magazine. It also says that we should hav a national meeting of Infidels at an early date, quietly ignoring the fact that we hav such a meeting every year, although the editor who makes the belated suggestion has never attended one of them. We are told that in this proposed meeting the brethren of Canada and Europe should be invited to participate. That is all right, but nothing new, for such an international gathering was held in Chicago during the World's Fair. Of course, the gentleman was not present, for if he had been he would not at this time in the afternoon speak of such a convention as of something never previously suggested or held. The same editor remarks that "never before in the history of this country has the outlook for Infidel supremacy been so encouraging." We hav no more use for Infidel supremacy than we hav for Christian supremacy. All we demand is that all citizens shall stand before the law equal in rights and opportunities.

Here is a faint ray of light in the Sabbatarian gloom of this decadent age: All of the missionaries and some of the employees on Ellis Island (immigrant station) petitioned that the station be closed on Sunday. President Cleveland, acting on the recommendation of Secretary Carlisle and Commissioner Stump, of the Immigration Bureau, declines to accede to the request. It is pointed out that "it would be unnecessary hardship on incoming immigrants to detain them for twenty-four or thirty-six hours, when first and second-class passengers on vessels which arrive Saturday night or Sunday morning are immediately landed."

That is humane and sensible, and is a substantial recognition of the equal rights of all, without regard to their financial condition, but what follows is still better, because of what it implies: "It is said that the government force at the island can be so divided that the men will hav to work only one Sunday out of three during the summer and alternate Sundays during the winter." If this is done at Ellis Island it will be an official application and indorsement of the "Relay Method," first suggested in these columns, and earnestly advocated by THE TRUTH SEEKER alone for nearly two years. Apply this principle to all work needing to be done on Sunday, and you hav effectually and forever spiked the last and only gun of the Sunday worshipers. Mere theorists are out of the fight in this practical age; Sunday sanctity cannot stand a moment before the onslaught of up-to-date Secularists. If Sunday is to be the weekly holiday of the tens of millions, the hundreds of thousands must work, and they will get their rest by the establishment of the relay system in every industry requiring Sunday labor. Why do not all Freethinkers and Freethought journals hasten to grasp this invincible weapon? Why hesitate? On the side of principle we always hav been amply armed, and now, if we are wise, we can meet the church on its new line of "rest," and silence its batteries in one campaign. Not only should we love liberty, but we must serve her in practical and efficient ways. The Sunday fight is on Now.

A motion was made in the Brooklyn Board of Aldermen to permit amateur ball players to use Prospect Park on Sunday. The proposition was voted down, seven to eleven, the seven being Aldermen Board, Cohen, Dunne, Gilfoyle, Hennessey, McGarry, and Roeder. Alderman Cary said that he was afraid some judgment would come down upon the board if it voted in favor of the motion. Alderman Cary should not be frightened so easily; he is not in any danger, probably, for we are assured that death loves a shining mark, and unquestionably he is dull enough to liv forever. Alderman Cohen) we fear he is not a Christian by heritage) said that he did not think a young man would go to hell merely because he played ball on Sunday. When the fact of division along party lines was pointed out, the aforesaid unresplendent Alderman Cary remarked that "Republicans were brought up to observe the Sabbath and go to church instead of playing ball." But, good Mr. Cary, do they always continue to walk in the straight and narrow way to the conventicle, and virtuously avoid the wicked ball field? How about Robert G. Ingersoll, to illustrate? He does not attend church very regularly, does he? And it occurs to us that he has caught out and struck out more champion church players than any other American Freethinker we can just now call to mind. He did not allow Black, or Fisher, or Field, or Gladstone to make a single run, did he? The majority of the Brooklyn Board of Aldermen seem to hav come in on a freight train; at all events, they are awfully out of date with their talk about "judgment" because they are asked to permit the young men of the city to pitch and bat a ball on Sunday. Go to sleep again, gentlemen, no bolt will find you. God could not see you without a microscope.

"The moral supremacy of the community, its unrestricted right to deal with its members, is the sole basis on which rational punishment can rest. . . . The rights of the individual man are, in short, to-day not worth consideration."—F. H. Bradley, in International Journal of Ethics.

The "moral supremacy of the community," the rights of the community, are the rights of the individuals composing the community, no less, no more. The only legitimate function of the community is the protection of the rights of the individual, and this function is simply the transferred functions of the individuals, aggregated. Power, not rights, is gained by association. If the writer had said that government, in its capacity of defender of the property, persons, and lives of its constituents, had supreme authority over the invading individual, his statement might be permitted to pass unchallenged, for the invaded individual has that authority when the seriousness of the invasion demands it, and we recognize that killing in self-defense is not a crime. But his assertions, as herein quoted, are unscientific and monstrous. The thousand units combined hav no more right to murder than had any one of the units before the combination was effected. Powers not possessed cannot be delegated. If Mr. Bradley is right, if the individual has no rights, then the community, the aggregation of individuals, can hav none. To draw an illustration from nature, outside of man: A thousand gallons of water, brought together in a reservoir and fed to a steam engin, will produce results not to be attained, in all cases, by the vaporization of the thousand gallons of water separately, but all the elements found in the contents of the reservoir existed previously in the same proportions in the isolated gallons, and the power developed by the larger quantity drawn from the reservoir was potentially present in all of the smaller quantities which, combined, filled the reservoir, and without which the reservoir could never hav been filled nor the power furnished to the engin developed. Mr. Bradley's dictum is not new, either in theory or application. Every religious and political tyrant in the world has accepted and acted upon it. Across the centuries Torquemada reaches his bloody hand to his modern echo, and Nicholas of Russia may well hail him as a brother. One very important deduction seems to hav escaped the amiable gentleman's observation: If the relatively free society in which he livs should put his teachings into practice it would hang him off-hand as one of its own most dangerous enemies. He would then discover that his individual rights are indeed "not worth consideration," because, like the rabid dog, he is an imminent menace to the safety of every other individual composing the free community.

The American Sentinel made a bad slip in its issue of May 30. During the trial of J. Q. Allison at Douglassville, Ga., for the violation of the Sunday law, the judge said, answering the plea of the defense that the Sunday statute interfered with the religious liberty of the citizen:

"I would not interfere with you in any way in the enjoyment of your religion; this is simply a law of the state, and we are bound thereby. The state could say that you should keep Wednesday or Thursday or every other Thursday, that it would be a crime to work on every other Wednesday or every other Thursday, and we would be bound to obey the law."

To this the editor of the Adventist paper replies: "This statement by the judge would be true if the law were indeed a merely civil regulation based upon civil reasons." The italics are his. He then goes on to show conclusively that the Sabbath law is not based on merely civil reasons, and thus effectually disposes of the judge's defense of the prosecution. But we are not here concerned with this aspect of the matter; what we would call attention to is the astounding admission of the Sentinel that the state has a right to make honest labor a crime on any day for any reason. This is unconditional surrender. Suppose that the state of Georgia should take Mr. Jones at his word and, abandoning its present Sabbath and repealing its Sabbath laws, should enact that hereafter Wednesday is to be an enforced legal secular holiday in the state, and that all work done on that day is a crime, to be duly punished by the courts—would the Adventists be any more eager to observe Wednesday as a secular day of rest than they now are to observe Sunday as a day of worship? The Adventists complain that the existing laws not only compel them to do jury duty, attend court as witnesses, and in other ways profane their Sabbath (Saturday), but they are also forced to lose two days each week instead of one. They likewise contend that God as imperatively commands man to work six days each week as he does to worship one. Well, with Wednesday set apart as a secular holiday, on which work is a crime, and their consciences impelling them to obey their God's command to work six days out of seven and to spend Saturday in worship, would they not hav been merely taken from the frying-pan and put into the fire? If they obey the civil law and God's Sabbath law they must disobey God's six-day work law and also lose one day each week which they would otherwise hav employed in productiv labor. They hav gained nothing by the change and liberty has gained nothing. The judge's statement is not true and cannot be true. The doctrine he advances is false and pernicious, and fit only for slaves, by whom alone it can be accepted. Compulsory labor is slavery, forever abolished in this country by war and by constitutional amendment, and compulsory idleness is simply the other side of compulsory labor, still to be abolished, possibly by war, certainly by repeal of all existing legislation compelling it, and by constitutional amendment if need be. It is against public policy to make either non-invasiv labor or non-invasiv recreation a crime under the law, and the aggregate of the population possesses not the shade of a shadow of a right to prescribe for the units how they shall employ their time. This is the bedrock principle of American liberty and of human liberty, and to abandon it is to be lost in the morasses and quicksands of despotism.

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1895 is great. Price, 25 cents.

News and Notes.

It was a grateful change after all to pass from the turmoil of London to the great quiet and beautiful country. London is a continual pressure, an everlasting excitement. There seems no end in time or space to its enormous activities. It is difficult to keep still long enough in London to write these News and Notes. I desire to be on the go, in the swim, all the time. The electric currents possess the universal air, and you cannot escape the sparkling influence unless you take a long journey into the country. One must do this occasionally, I think, in order to recover his equilibrium.

Hence I rejoiced in the loveliness of English scenery as I dashed to Derby on the express, with Watts and Foote in the compartment with me. How delightfully the landscapes spread away from the rushing train; fields and meadows, forests and hills, dotted with villages and handsome dwellings of the rich and lordly, with now and then a towering church or castle, ancient relics of gloom, in the bourgeon of this glorious spring time, adorning the portals of the past, while the music and splendor of the future are bursting forth.

With these mingling feelings of reminiscence and hope, the end of our journey is reached at Derby, a stately village of one hundred thousand people; a village, it seemed to me, after London and in contrast with American cities of like size. An American city would hum from one end to the other, but here the people move along without hurry or tumult, and honestly it did seem to me at first sight as if I had struck a New England burg of about five thousand population. However, Derby is a handsome place, and the people are good-natured and accommodating.

There were bubbles of excitement, however, circulating through its streets. There was to be a clash of arms in the intellectual arena, and the religious and Freethought spirits were in a state of animated expectancy. The debate between Mr. Foote and Mr. T. W. Lee took place at Temperance Hall. There were present, I should think, fifteen hundred people at each session. At any rate, the hall was crowded to its utmost capacity. The Christians were on hand to witness the downfall of Infidelity. They composed at least three-fifths of the audience.

Mr. W. J. Piper, editor of the Derby Daily Telegraph, presided on both evenings. He is, I understand, a Unitarian, and he did his duty impartially and admirably, and held the reins of government so firmly that the perturbed theological soul must needs listen according to parliamentary rule, a thing which Mr. Piper said could not have been done ten years ago. Free debate was then impossible. Secularism has been training the people.

Mr. T. W. Lee is a representative of the Christian Evidence Society. He has been a disputant for about fifteen years. He was at the beginning, I understand, bombastic and egotistical; and I can see some remains of the primeval strata yet. Occasionally, by his manner and the look of his eye, it appeared to my mind that he would like to demolish things by pure physical force, by the "sword of faith," and not by the clash of argument; but evidently he has learned his lesson and holds his theological team under good control. He does not allow his temper to get the best of him. He is keen, shrewd, and well equipped. He is a wily opponent. He knows when to dodge, and where to put in his hardest blows. He is a skilled dialectician. He manages his case with the adroitness of a lawyer. He has evidently studied the defenses of modern theology. I must confess that I was pleased with his energy, his tenacity, and his determination not to be whipped, no matter how severe might be the blows upon his metaphysical cranium. Even if he was knocked down he wouldn't admit it, and he had a majority of the audience to shout victory while in the jaws of defeat.

Mr. Foote was the man for the occasion. He is imperturbable, no matter how furious the conflict. He does not get excited. He measures his opponent fairly. He knows what he has to do; that the majority of the audience is hostile, and he must handle his subject both carefully and courageously. He has the power both of eloquence and logic. The people are bound to listen to what he says. He constrains by his personal presence. He has physical vitality. He is like a soldier. His speech is persuasiv, his method argumentativ, with here and there a brilliant illustration or flash of humor. He appeals to the intellect. He is analytic and convincing. He made his hearers see differences where his opponent endeavored to confound them. Not until his closing address did he gather together in one thunderbolt the condensed logic of his incisive reasoning; and then he fairly captured his audience with his splendid peroration, and extorted applause even from the orthodox crowd. Once in a while the enemy showed his teeth and growled, and was just on the point of precipitating a mob; but Foote was in his element then and quelled his audience by what they could not help but admire, his display of English grit.

Mr. Lee in his argument followed the usual metaphysical lines. He made a statement not of facts, but of opinions. The question was "Which is the more reasonable, Theism or Atheism?" Mr. Lee said in substance: Something now exists, therefore something has always existed, for something cannot come out of nothing. What is this eternal something? It cannot be the universe as it now is, for that we know has changed. It cannot be the atoms which compose the universe, for they are conditioned and limited. The uncreated substance must be unconditioned and unlimited. Being unconditioned and unlimited, is it intelligent? It is, for the order and symmetry of the created universe declare this. Is it benevolent? It is, for the universe also declares that on the whole created existence is for good and not for evil.

This is the substance of Mr. Lee's argument. It is the old argument from design; an argument which cannot be improved upon with all the artifices of modern theology. Through thick and thin, Mr. Lee stuck to his argument with manful resolve. It was his only salvation.

Mr. Foote did not endeavor to meet Mr. Lee with any metaphysical back-fire whatsoever. He wisely confined himself to facts. He stuck to the scientific method entirely. What are the facts of the universe, and what do these facts mean? In the original statement of the question Mr. Lee put it as follows: "Resolved, That Theism is a more reasonable theory of the universe than Atheism." Mr. Foote declined to admit the words "theory of the universe," for, said he, Atheism is not a "theory of the universe." It does not profess to explain things. It is simply an acceptance of facts as far as they go. Mr. Foote was right in this. He did not try to elucidate the universe, but simply the facts of human knowledge. These facts, if there is any validity in human knowledge, teach that it is impossible that the universe should be created by an infinitely wise, powerful, and good being. In the first place we cannot conceive creation, and therefore it cannot be reasonable. But allowing creation, the creative force, whatever it may be, is responsible for all that exists. It therefore creates the evil, and cannot therefore be infinitely good. It cannot be infinitely wise, for everywhere are marks of imperfection. Therefore, whatever the creative force may be, it cannot be God as defined by Theism. God, so far as we know, is purely the creation of the human mind.

These were the points elaborated by Mr. Foote. He did not once get off his base. He did not try to

And mingle with the eternal ray.

He let all speculation alone. He did not build up an airy fabric of Atheism as opposed to an airy fabric of Theism. He did not dogmatize about the unknown. He simply said, These are the facts; Theism does not fit the facts. No Theistic theory ever invented by man does fit the facts. What is the inevitable conclusion? Atheism pure and simple. Agnosticism is practically the same thing. It rejects every known theory of Theism. Therefore it is "without God," and that is Atheism. No doubt the Christians saw the force of Mr. Foote's argument. They realized as never before the logic of Atheism; that, based on facts, it is impregnable, and that the only answer to it is the wail of faith and the gush of sentiment. Mr. Lee knew how to wail and how to gush, and he sought applause by expressing the fervor of his belief. The Christians knew the point, and applauded his assumptions vociferously, while when he attempted argument they were dumb. His logical weakness was apparent even to his friends.

The debate will give a fine impetus to the Secular movement in Derby. It has awakened thought, and the philosophy of Secularism is better understood. It is seen that Atheism is not a bare denial, but really the affirmation of humanity with all its resplendent qualities.

I was pleased to meet the Liberal friends of Derby. I expect to lecture at this place while in England. Mr. W. Westwell and Mr. Robert Ainsworth were present from Manchester. We were at the same hotel, and the hours outside the debate were enlivened with generous sociability. Under the guidance of Mr. Foote and Mr. Westwell I discovered the superb beauties of English cooking. I don't understand Daudet when he speaks of the "coarse meat and horrible cookery" of England. I suppose I shall know more about it when I visit Paris, if I have the opportunity, but I really think at present that the English do know how to cook.

On Thursday we had a delightful drive together about Derbyshire, and the prospects were lovely indeed. Here is English scenery in its simple magnificence. Nothing like the wild and grand scenery, the prairies and mountains of America, but there were ample fields undulating and glittering in emerald glory; there were antique forests, over whose crumbling arches swept the splendor of the spring, decorating anew the immemorial columns; there were gentle declivities fading into the cloudy and luminous horizon, the green hedges, the hard and shining road, the snug hamlet, the lodge and stately gateway, the elegant park, the gardens just beginning to bloom, the great mansion, half hid by trees and shrubbery; the wandering herds following the dog, the horseman in the distance; the white flocks, the shimmering lake embosomed in the hills; the town, splendid on the verge between earth and sky, like a fairy picture, gorgeous and illuminated with the slanting rays breaking from floating cloudlands, while, mingling with these scenes, burst and quivered and rolled the sweet singing of the birds. And how shall I describe the delicious lunch—milk and soda, bread, butter, and cheese? That was all we could find in the remote village, amid whose quaint and picturesque precincts we seemed to be flung back a hundred years, far from the haunts of civilization. I did not know that so secluded and venerable a spot, where the din of the world is lost amidst gray and mossy walls and blackened rafters, could be found in the bustling England of to-day. But England, after all, stretches wide and far, and has an infinit variety of aspect, and the old continually mingles with the new.

After the debate on Thursday night, a large deputation of Secular friends waited upon Mr. Foote and thanked him for the admirable fight he had made. Mr. W. Whitney spoke in behalf of the Derby branch of the National Secular Society, and congratulated Mr. Foote upon the efficient and dignified manner in which he had defended their position. The American visitor also received a cordial welcome. So the Derby meeting closed with enthusiasm and courage in the Freethought ranks at this important point.

Saturday morning Mr. Foote, Mr. Watts, and myself visited Nottingham for a few hours. This is about fourteen miles from Derby, a manufacturing town of 240,000 inhabitants. It has a much more business-like appearance than Derby. The passers-by are more alert and there are crowds occasionally. The great castle looms on a precipitous height as we approach the station. We did not have time, however, to mount its frowning walls, around which so many battalions have surged and crowded in bleeding masses. We visited the Arboretum, in which there is a beautiful display of flowers, with walks amid blooming foliage and dazzling carpet of grass, from the crest of which, where the monument and cannons gleam, is spread a vast and splendid panorama of the city. Returning, we pass through the cemetery, in whose shadowy majesty white death mingles with many-colored, blossoming life. We witness the memorials of those who have served humanity, and whose names are in the annals of Freethought. Among those shines the name of William Nowlan, the father of Mrs. Charles Watts. He was one of the champions of the Secular cause in Nottingham years ago. Nottingham is noted as one of the old camping-grounds of Watts. Here he has borne the lance in the arena of intellectual debate, and made Freethought victorious. Therefore there are pleasant and noble recollections connected with this place. I was pleased to meet Mr. Chater, and also, at his house, Mrs. Charles A. Watts, daughter-in-law of my veteran comrade. She was sojourning here for a few days on account of her health. Nottingham will brightly abide in the memory of the Secular Pilgrim, though but a few hours were passed amid its charming associations.

At Nottingham my comrades bid me good-bye after having seen me safely into the cars bound for Bradford. At this place, where I arrive at early candle light, I am met by J. W. Gott, John Grange, H. Smith, and James Sunderland, and their cordial greeting makes me ready for any fate in this somewhat frontier post of English Freethought, for Freethought is not by any means in the swim here at Bradford. It is a constant struggle to keep above water, but there are strenuous and noble workers. The Truth Seeker is a monthly publication, and it is doing good service to advance organization. It is a useful pioneer journal, sold for only a penny, and one gets more than his money's worth every time. Such a journal in America would cost at least five pennies. By means of the Truth Seeker Bradford forges ahead and keeps the light of reason sparkling abroad. I have fair audiences for the three lectures on Sunday, May 19th, and they are appreciative and enthusiastic, and I must say that I like Bradford whatever the fortunes of war may be. I enjoy the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Gott, and am surrounded with home comforts. Saturday afternoon I take a trip with Sunderland over the city, or town, rather, for although Bradford has a population of 240,000, it is not, in English parlance, a city, for it has no cathedral and no bishop. Only those places are cities where cathedrals and bishops put in an imposing appearance.

Bradford, in some parts of the day, and at some places, presents almost as busy and crowded a scene as London. It is a manufacturing point. The Lister mills, the largest in the world, are here. They are simply immense, and astonish one with their height and variety. I visit Manningham park, a beautiful place. Bradford is amply endowed with parks. Outside of London, it surpasses all other towns of its size for the number it possesses, although in the heart of the city we do not see trees and gardens as we do in London.

Bradford is a picturesque place, although it is crowded with warehouses and factories, and its streets are narrow and crooked like those of Boston. I travel, after my rounds of the principal resorts, to the home of Mr. Sunderland at Undercliffe, and it is a climb to get there. It is like going up Zion's hill. However, we don't have to walk; we ride on the top of a big tramcar. The tramcars here have two stories, and they do present a gigantic appearance. A wonderful and beautiful view is unfolded as I mount upward on this tremendous vehicle. Bradford is built mainly in the heart of a great basin. Vast hills roll away on every side, decorated with residences. Far as the eye can see these billowy mountains extend. It was like many a scene in the Old Granit state, and reminded me more of my native territory than any place I had yet visited. The sun was setting as we traversed the lofty ridge, and it was indeed a gorgeous prospect. The sky was like a vast dome of mingling gold and blue, with darkening gray. Swell on swell of table lands and mighty hills like the swaying of a huge sea swept to every point of the horizon, while deep down below gleamed and glowered the multitudinous city. As my friend Smith said, looking at Bradford at night time, when its thousand lights were flashing, it seems as if heaven itself was turned topsy-turvy, and all the shining stars were huddled and scattered in flaming masses in the abyss beneath. Bradford certainly can boast of beauty and sublimity.

I must not omit to write of Laycock's Temperance Hotel, where they drink tea and eat toast and talk with the volubility of a ladies' sewing circle. It is a congregation of cranks from morning till night, and the humming and the buzzing, and the flashing and the crashing of ever-varying ideas is immensely amusing. It is like the sputtering of electric batteries with opposing currents. This is one of the oldest places in Bradford, and is a curiosity shop indeed. Here is freedom of speech, the utmost antagonism of thought with prevailing good nature, while occasionally there is a lurid lightning glare which threatens disaster, but glances off in a rainbow shower of jolly laughter. I wouldn't have missed Laycock's on any account. It was unique, universal, interesting, evolutionary, and revolutionary. I liked it. It was good as a play. I hope it will keep rolling and tumbling on in Niagara-like fashion, with its intellectual rapids, long as the world stands. Bradford won't be a dull place to visit as long as Laycock's flourishes.

John Grange was chairman of the meetings and made excellent opening addresses, giving a hearty welcome to the American visitor. Friends were present from Leeds, Shipley, Halifax, and other neighboring places. Some came many miles afoot to attend. I was quite encouraged to meet these loyal comrades. I must extend my thanks to the ladies, Mrs. Gott, Mrs. Grange, Mrs. Sunderland, and others, for their support. Only a few ladies in Bradford are willing to be identified with the movement. It is a pleasure to find a few who are brave and intelligent.

I leave Bradford with the star of progress shining upon my way. I have faith in the courage and devotion of our allies here. Especially must I thank Mr. J. W. Gott for his generous comradeship.

I return to London on Monday. I spend the evening at Watts's, where we outline future campaigns. Tuesday I am busy with News and Notes and can't see much, although there are thousands of objects yet to view. Tuesday evening I attend the annual meeting of the Malthusian League. I listened to earnest and splendid addresses from Dr. C. R. Drysdale, president; George W. Foote, A. B. Moss, Dr. T. R. Allinson, Miss Thornton Smith, and others. I was deeply interested in the many and fruitful ideas advanced. Of course I cannot see but what the Malthusian proposition is correct. Population must increase faster than the means of subsistence, and the check must be war, famine, and pestilence, or wise human control. It is a subject worthy of the widest consideration and the utmost liberty of expression. I am afraid we could not hold such a meeting as this in New York. We have not freedom of speech enough yet. Our English friends are ahead of us on some points. They have fought the good fight and won. Of course, in England, where the population is so overflowing, the pressure of the Malthusian question is much greater than in our own country, whose natural resources are still far in advance of the demand made upon them, but the time is surely coming when we in America must confront this enormous problem, the solution of which is absolutely necessary to human progress.

After the meeting I had a walk and talk amid London lights and shadows with A. B. Moss, and Mr. Lawrence, a veteran of the Bradlaugh ranks. We stood on London Bridge—historic spot—and watched the wonderful scene and in imagination traversed the ages past. We went by the old London Tower, glooming in the solemn midnight with the strange majesty of crime and death, and horror and glory; we passed over the stupendous Tower Bridge, a marvel of human achievement, one of the most amazing structures anywhere on the planet; a kind of crystallized Niagara in its magnificence, strength, loftiness, and massive proportions. I walked through Billingsgate, silent as the grave at this hour, with only a solitary policeman on his rounds, but at five o'clock in the morning what life and language burst in tumult here, a pandemonium of every ejaculation under the sun. The tower of Babel or the day of Pentecost couldn't equal this for diversity of tongues.

A. B. Moss is one of our best workers on this side, a vigorous and straightforward speaker. He has had a vast variety of experience. He is London born and bred, and understands how to reach and move the great masses of the people.

I was also glad to meet Edward Truelove, the oldest of our veterans here. He is in his 85th year. His courage is unquenchable. He has suffered in our cause, but bates no jot of heart or hope. He will die in the harness, with all the glorious enthusiasm of youth.

My New York and Brooklyn friends will remember Caleb Pink, now in London. He was the first of the audience at the Hall of Science to give me the handshake. He is still on the move and his philosophic spirit is as bright as ever. He likes England, but his heart beats for America. He takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and reads it every week with enthusiasm. He keeps in touch with Freethought the world over. I remember him years ago as one of the foremost lights of the Liberal Club and Philosophical Association, and memories throng upon me as I greet his kindly face. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Lecture Notes.

Lakota, N. D., my next appointment after Crookston, had never before heard a Freethought lecture, and never before have I seen a place take so kindly to Liberalism. Orthodoxy is certainly in the minority here, and it knows it. At first it tried to show its hand by objecting to our having the court house for the meetings, but the people were aroused by this petty usurpation, and the religionists were obliged to climb down. I gave three lectures, all of which were well attended. The Nelson County Herald remarked: "One of the contrasts between the present age and that of two hundred years ago is the fact that lectures on the line of those of Mr. Steiner could not have been given in open public in those days, while now all classes pay him respectful attention. In those days he would have been stoned to death by Jew and gentile alike, and could have found no place where he might lay his head in peace." This is just as true of fifty years ago as of two hundred, and we could not lecture to-day if the church had power to prevent.

First among Lakota Liberals I must mention J. M. Hartin, who made all arrangements and to whose efforts the success of the lectures was due. He was cradled in the church, his father being an Episcopal minister. Those who have had opportunity to know the most of Christianity have the least faith in it. Friend Hartin and his brothers had such opportunity, and they are all Freethinkers. Mrs. Hartin is right in line, being as enthusiastic as her husband. I was a guest at their home, and was certainly in a good atmosphere. Col. E. Smith, of Bartlett, presided at the lectures. The colonel is true blue. He has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since its first issue in New York. He was a good chairman, and made some pointed speeches illustrating our principles. Mr. F. A. Rahders, the banker, supported us splendidly. He is a native of South Carolina, well educated and versed on all topics, being a graduate of Trinity College, Durham. Charles Barta and wife came over from Mapes. Messrs. Metcalf and Barrett are strong allies.

Early Monday morning I start for Hoople, where I am to give three more lectures. Remsburg has been here once, and Putnam twice. The community is thoroughly aroused. A sky-pilot who was holding revival meetings told the people how he had "done up" Putnam on the train, when he was here last winter, so completely that he had nothing to say. Surely my chances were small, yet not one of the vain clerical parasites in Hoople had the courage to attend my lectures, and no doubt they will make a similar lying statement about me when I am a thousand miles away. Mr. M. A. Hewitt made the arrangements. Although in business here, he is outspoken, and has the trade even of the preachers. Quite a crowd of Park River Liberals came over the first two nights. The school-house was full at all the lectures, but the third evening it was crowded, and we had the Hoople band to add to the attractions. Mr. Jones, the school teacher, organized a choir, and we had singing as well. With such men as Thomas Simons, W. C. Francis, Geo. Bodmer, J. E. Flannigan, Geo. Johnson, and A. D. Marble at the front, Freethought is a formidable force in Hoople. Mr. Haight came in from Milton, and Mr. C. E. Anderson from Grafton. They all, and particularly Mr. Hewitt and Mr. Johnson, did everything they could to make my visit agreeable. Mr. John J. Kolmen came over from Park River and remained until the last lecture, when I accompanied him home. No finer country than North Dakota could be found for driving—no hills, the land as level as a billiard table; no stones in the soil to impede the plow of the farmer. The great pest here is the gopher, an animal of about the size of a squirrel, which it resembles. It lives in the ground and does great damage to crops, but the government pays a bounty for gophers, and they will in time be exterminated. After an hour and a half we reached our destination. Things are different in Park River from what they were last winter. Then the Christians were going to annihilate us on the spot. Now they are as silent as the grave. Even the Methodist pulpiteer is quiet, and no Christian will say a word when a Freethinker is within hearing distance. Our audiences were not big, but they were good both in size and quality. Mr. E. Smith-Petersen presided. He is naturally, and by common consent, the leader in Park River. Physically as well as mentally he is a specimen of perfect manhood. He possesses dauntless courage, and nothing can move him when he knows he is in the right. Edward Doering is secretary of the Liberal League. John J. Kolmen is a fighter by nature, and no Christian cares to enter into a discussion with him. Among other Liberals, I can name Mr. Ames, John Mundagel, M. M. Ager, and Ole Stevens—all of the right kind and well fitted to hold their own in this bigoted community. On Sunday morning Mr. and Mrs. Kolmen and myself went to hear the Rev. Mr. Campbell, a very liberal Presbyterian minister. There is progress even in the pulpit. Mr. Campbell does not deal much in theology, but in ethics, and calls the attention of his people to the necessity of right living. He admits that unbelief is not a sin, and that creeds to a great extent have been a damage to the world. Last winter he boldly announced that he would treat Liberals fairly and courteously, and he is held in high esteem by all who possess the same qualities as himself. FRANKLIN STEINER.

Observations.

With Mr. Morris M. Bostwick's contribution, two weeks ago, to the one-god-or-several question, the debate went outside my baliwick. Astro-theology and the Bacon-Shakspeare cipher are not for me. There are those who give all the spooks of the religious imagination an astronomical significance, identifying the son of God with the sun-god, the twelve apostles with the twelve months of the year, and all the acts and adventures of Jesus Christ with the phenomena of the seasons. Others discover a phallic significance in the accounts of the creation and redemption, and infer a system of sex worship from crosses, buns, and doughnuts. Still another school find the trail of a snake from Genesis to Revelation, and thence conclude that Christianity had its origin in serpent-worship. The theories are interesting, but scholars who profess to take a rational view of the Bible are cautious about endorsing them. I once communicated with Prof. T. H. Huxley in order to obtain his opinion of Dr. Robert Taylor's astro-theology as set out in the "Diegesis." He replied in effect that while, seventy years ago, a man in jail for blasphemy, as Dr. Taylor was, and galled by the persecutions of those who preach the religion of love, might be forgiven for putting forth such a work, people of the present age would not be justified in taking it seriously. I give Mr. Huxley's opinion for what it is worth.

The plain defect of astronomy as an explanation of theology is that while it might account for the characters in Hebrew and Christian mythdom, it does not provide for the doctrine and precepts. No sane person would accuse the solar orb of preaching the Sermon on the Mount, nor can that luminary be conceived of as laying down the Ten Commandments. And again, the astronomical hypothesis violates the law of parsimony, which forbids us to assume any greater cause than is necessary to account for the facts. With a full knowledge of the lying and inventiv faculties of priests and prophets, and their proneness to claim all they see or hear, we are wasting time when we look elsewhere for the source of religious systems. Christianity is undoubtedly made up of the refuse and pi of previous superstitions, some of which may have had a basis in astrology, but I don't believe that the inventors or adapters of Christian theology knew enough about astronomy to consciously fit their yarns to it. Truth-telling, the adapting of statement to fact, the agreement between the subjective order of thought and the objective order of phenomena, has been cultivated only in comparatively recent years, and has not yet found favor with the clergy.

When the New York Voice jeers at the Detroit Tribune for uttering the appended sentiments, it is a case of the pot calling the kettle a brunet. The Tribune says:

Society is not capable of being immoral. The essence of wrong conduct is the interference with the liberty of the individual. Society is federated for the express purpose of interfering with the liberty of the individual. It cannot be hampered at all with the general considerations of right and wrong. If society has the right to tax, it has the right to kill.

It seems necessary, before remarking that the foregoing is sound Prohibition doctrine, to point out that when the editor of the Tribune talks about society he is thinking about the state, for society is not federated and it has no right either to tax or to kill. The description fits the state as now constituted. The power of society is moral suasion. By general consent or dissent it can exclude, ostracize, and condemn, but of itself it is physically impotent. The state, however, represents force and executes its sentences by that method. It has no moral or religious function, and knows nothing about "God," as the editor of the Voice implies that it should. The state is not federated professedly for the purpose of interfering with the liberty of the individual, although, owing to the pressure brought to bear upon it by society, it often does so. It is owing to the illicit relations between Society and State that we have such afflictions as the Sabatarians, the Comstocks, and the Prohibitionists; and if the members of these combinations deny the truth of the Detroit Tribune's statement that by federating together a gang of invaders become incapable of wrong, then they are all felons in act or intent. An established tyranny, and a fixed disregard for right and rights, are conditions precedent to enforcing the observance of religious ceremonies, the practice of prescribed morality, or the principles of the Prohibition party.

"Miss Susan H. Wixon," says the Fall River Evening News, "has been appointed by the governor, with the advice of the council, a special commissioner to administer oaths, to take depositions, and to take acknowledgments of deeds; and to perform such other duties as are defined in chapter 252 of the Acts of 1883, and chapter 197 of the Acts of 1889." Greetings to Commissioner Wixon. And since events like this are vouchsafed to us in order that we may thereby be instructed, let us point the evident moral. To women, then, the sage would remark that Qualification for public office is sometimes recognized by those empowered to bestow it, and that the way to female enfranchisement traverses the domain of education, mental independence, common sense, and right living. Miss Wixon has chosen to walk in that path, and preferment has on several occasions advanced to welcome her. Therein is the lesson to her sisters. Let them make themselves fit. But let them not hope to attain such fitness so long as they lead the way to church with a man who flourishes a stick, while they carry the prayer-book.

In the twentieth chapter of Exodus, in the Bible, the writer, who pretends to report the language of Yahweh addressed to Moses, says (verse 10): "The seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work." No penalty is prescribed for the violation of this command, but perhaps that was understood, for God knew of only one, the same being death. There was no offense so petty under God as not to demand capital punishment for the offender, outrage and murder for his family, and extermination for his tribe, provided the Jews had the sand to tackle it. The only case where the followers of Moses seem to have had any hesitancy about lynching the accused is recorded in Numbers xv, 32-36. The children of Israel found a man who had gathered firewood on the Sabbath, "and they put him in ward, because it was not declared what should be done with him." Moses, "the greatest lawgiver the world has ever known," had given a law with no penalty attached! To get a ruling in the case, the children applied to the said Moses, when that prince of rascals and impostors consulted his fetich and pronounced the sentence, to wit:

"And the Lord said unto Moses, The man shall surely be put to death; all the congregation shall stone him with stones without the camp" (Num. xv, 35).

The penalty here fixed has the same force as the statute, God and Moses being responsible for both. As a matter of fact, according to modern usage, the Fourth Commandment is void without it, for there is no virtue in a law unless its violation has a penalty and provision is made for its enforcement. Everybody knows this except our legislators. Therefore Numbers xv, 35, has to be regarded as an essential part of the Fourth Commandment. Together they give us the law against Sabbath-breaking; together they fix the penalty for infraction of the law, which is death by stoning; and they specify the persons, i. e., the congregation, whose duty it is to execute the sentence. Thus amalgamated, nothing could be completer.

The foregoing, while the result of wide research on my part, is preliminary to a question I would ask of the Seventh-Day Adventists, who hold that the Fourth Commandment, which they call the law of God, is binding upon them as regards the Bible Sabbath. What I desire to know is whether they also believe in the penalty, and if not, why not? A citizen who should say that he indorsed the law against homicide, but did not think it ought to be enforced, would be suspected of entertaining small respect for the authority of the legislature or the sanctity of human life. Will the Adventists take the same position respecting the divine law against Saturday labor, or will the congregation have the courage of their faith and stone the Sabbath-breaker to death? Are they, as a "congregation," under any greater obligation to keep the law than to insist on its enforcement?

I ask these questions with all the seriousness that is due to a discussion of the adventures of Baron Munchausen, and I hope that the Adventists will therefore consider them worthy of a reply.

The lectures of Mr. S. P. Putnam in England have aroused one Christian to the point of replying to them. How important a person he is who thus comes to the defense of the church is not known this side the Atlantic, but he subscribes himself "C. Lloyd Engstrom, Secretary of the Christian Evidence Society." What Mr. Engstrom objects to mainly is the Secular Pilgrim's statement that "faith is, to Christians, everything, and character and conduct nothing." He avers that English Christians teach nothing of the sort, and doubts very much that American Christians do, but there he speaks without knowledge. I have under my eye a sermon by the Rev. Dr. Rylance, an eminent clergyman as there is in this city, in which, deploring the havoc that the doctrine under discussion has wrought in Protestant circles, he says: "We have alienated thousands. Even our own large-hearted church [Episcopal], in one of its articles, has said that good deeds done without the grace of Christ are in the nature of sin." They may have a different way of damning people in England, but if Dr. Rylance knows as much as Mr. Engstrom about what is wicked in America—and I think Mr. Engstrom will admit that he does—then Putnam's statement is borne out by the lamentable facts. He might have made it stronger, for his contention is only that in the eye of the church good works without grace amount to nothing, while according to the creed they are worse than nothing—they are a sin. The doctrine leaves the unbeliever to choose between good deeds, which, being sinful, will land him in perdition, and bad deeds, which, being unlawful, will bring him to the penitentiary. That is why Christianity is called a plan of salvation.

Rivalry of Gods.

Looking steadfastly at nothing weakens the eye. So the contemplation of supernatural vagaries weakens the faculty of reason. While seeking only for support of preconceived opinions, one is unable to measure the value of evidence; and that is the common attitude of the religionist.

If the Mosaic God be a genuine one, the Jew is justified in disputing the Christian claim that a Jewish maiden gave birth to another god. The argument is wholly with the Jew. But if the Christian's Jesus is or was a real god, who appointed apostles and emperors to establish a divine church kingdom on earth, then the Catholic is justified in disputing the claim of the Protestant that after jumping out of the sacred fold he is still in it. The argument, if any, is wholly with the Catholic. Unfortunately, some Protestants perceive this much logic, and are in training to jump back again.

When a Christian reads a text from the holy Koran he readily perceives the ridiculous assumptions therein; but when he reads his own holy Bible, being forestalled in the belief of its divine origin, he is utterly blind to its equally preposterous assumptions. Could he read the Bible without bias he would see that its most prominent features are the admission that all the surrounding tribes and nations "in those days" had each its peculiar god, and the claim that the Mosaic God is greater and stronger than all the other gods combined. He would note the rivalry of the gods.

In that old book, o'ergrown with moss,
Its God 'mong gods strives hard to boss.

Each tribe or nation had more or less confidence in the protecting power of its own mystic god.

The Mosaic God was conceived in Egypt, and is only a variation of the Egyptian god Ammon. Instead of the God bringing the Israelites out of Egypt, it is Moses that brings the God out. After a fabulous contest in the miracle business between the two gods in Egypt, Moses departs and safely lands his god in the wilderness of Sinai. That was a good place for more miracles. All the finest ware and colors then known, and all the precious stones now known, besides much gold and silver, were promptly at hand with which to construct and beautify sacred vessels, tabernacles, mercy-seat, etc., all done by a band of poor fugitives and their god in a wilderness.

But the god Ammon is not forgotten nor forgiven. The common people, who knew little about gods, are commanded thus: I am the Lord, thy God, which hath brought thee out of Egypt. Thou shalt have no other gods before me; for I am a jealous God, etc. Here is given the character of this particular god, who is as yet only a god of the Israelites and is jealous. He punishes them savagely for regarding any other god.

When the successors of Moses emerged from the wilderness with this God, and invaded "a land of peace and plenty," the Israelites began robbing and stealing, as their fathers had done in Egypt. The inhabitants appealed to their gods. For centuries the battles of the gods continued—sometimes one and then another being the victor. The "land of peace and plenty" was made desolate. Its children were slaughtered while a God stayed the sun from going down.

Afterwards the Hebrew minstrel prophets sing the exploits of their God—the god of battles, the lord of hosts, the king of kings, the only One—in their estimation. In the general scrimmage of the gods, the sanguinary God of Israel overcomes a number of more peaceful ones, while the Assyrian gods Baal and Baaltis—representing the sun and earth-life—demolish a few others. Then comes a bitter contest between the Mosaic and the Assyrian gods. It is written in direful Isaiah xxxvi: "Hath any of the gods of the nations delivered his land out of the hand of the king of Assyria? Where are the gods of Hamath, of Arphad, of Sepharvaim, and of Samaria? Who among all the gods of these lands that have delivered their land out of my hand, that the Lord should deliver Jerusalem out of my hand?" And then the "lord god" is made captive in Babylon for seventy years. Rather humiliating for the god almighty. But why mourn?

From innumerable testimonies of like character, take a sample from woful Jeremiah concerning his jealous God's disposition: "For according to the number of thy cities were thy gods, O Judah; and ye have set up altars to that shameful thing, to burn incense unto Baal. Therefore, thus saith the Lord of hosts, Behold, I will punish them; the young men shall die by the sword; their sons and their daughters shall die by famine." Another outburst: "Behold, I will fill all the inhabitants of this land, even the kings that sit upon David's throne, and the priests and the prophets of Jerusalem, with drunkenness; and I will dash them one against another, even the fathers and the sons together, saith the Lord."

When the great Persian god Ormuzd swooped down upon the Assyrian, the Mosaic God was liberated and he escaped to Jerusalem. Then the minstrels sang of the impossible deeds done by him in and out of Egypt, of his weepings while captiv in Babylon, and what he still proposed to do to his rivals. But, after a long contest with Dagon and other small gods, the Romans, with Olympian Jove, tethered him.

Now in this sorry state of things a few of his friends, deeming the God weak through age, conceived a son-god by him who might prove more successful in fighting rival gods. In great measure their hopes were realized. Whether due to the natural workings of the principle of evolution, to the stupid indolence of the gods in general, or to the delirium tremens of dissipated Jove, true it is, the son-god succeeded in supplanting the Roman god.

Then followed a lively hunt for game gods; and thundering Thor and hallowed Odin of the North, who still liv and warm the heart in exquisit legends, were beheaded. For a long time this son-god subdued everything before him; and superstition, ignorance, and darkness covered his realms.

But suddenly a new god (Allah—a near relation of the Mosaic God) appeared in the South. And a long, sanguinary contest followed between the son and his uncle god. Whole provinces were devastated and deluged in blood. Millions of devotees sacrificed themselves to please the gods. This glorious fight, however, proved a tie game. The son-God could not gain and hold possession of his own tomb.

Finally, the son-god has never been able to obtain peace among his own following. In innumerable instances during eighteen centuries he has been seen leading the hosts of simple zealots against each other—in fact, fighting against himself. As family quarrels are more bitter, so these brotherly fights for godly possession are the most cruel. Many a wing of these legions of credulous mortals, fancying entire possession of the god, hav fought with godly confidence when a half or more of him was in the other camp. Christendom, down to the beginning of the present century, was made a vast slaughter-house in the struggle for possession of the son-god.

Comparativ peace now prevails; but much of the old godly temper remains. A godly or hellish zephyr may again fill the banner of superstitious fury, and even this fair land of ours be deluged with the blood of heretics.

Whenever asked how I came to be an unbeliever, I reply, "By reading the Bible and listening to orthodox preaching." Answering an inquirer, Jefferson wrote: "Read the Bible as you would read any book; use your own reason and judgment." Were all to read the Bible in that manner, few persons would believe in the claim of its inspired origin.

One day, when driving an old white horse, a shower came suddenly on and I raised an umbrella. The horse took fright, and tore dangerously along as though a devil was after him. The umbrella had to come down. I afterward learned that someone, when that horse was a colt, suddenly sprung open an umbrella in its face, which caused a fright it never got over.

The children of godly parents are treated in like manner. Spooks are thrust in their innocent faces, and their infant minds inoculated with superstitious fears that remain in the system through life. Few are ever able to purge them out.

N. B.—The great business of the priest is to increase the number of children somehow and to inoculate them with spook virus. L. G. REED.

Our Gentlemanly Censor.

Anthony Comstock, who makes a business of digging out vice, went into a quick-lunch restaurant in the Temple Court building yesterday during the democratic bustle that characterizes such places in business hours. Comstock is a big man, physically. He had pushed his way to the center and secured a seat near the source of supplies, and was helping himself and apparently getting along with more comfort than most of his neighbors when a regular patron of the place, a modest man, Broker John V. Royer of Orange, managed to get up to the counter. Reaching over Comstock's shoulder, Mr. Boyer helped himself to a sandwich, in accordance with the custom of the place. Comstock took in the size of Mr. Boyer, who is much smaller than he, let his passions rise, and, turning with a growl, he struck the broker's arm a blow with his elbow, sending the sandwich which he had in his hand flying across the room.

"What do you mean by jostling me?" cried Comstock.

Boyer tried to explain that he didn't mean to jostle any one, but Comstock burst forth in a tirade of loud-mouthed abuse, which he punctuated with occasional vehement declarations of "I am a gentleman, I am!"

It looked for a time as if there was going to be a fight, in which a good many persons seemed ready to take up Boyer's part, but the manager of the place finally reached Comstock and advised him to behave himself like the kind of a person he said he was.—Sun.

Annual Convention Oregon State Secular Union.

At the regular quarterly meeting of the board of directors of the Oregon State Secular Union, held at the residence of President W. W. Jesse, Portland, Or., on Sunday, June 2, 1895, it was voted that the next annual convention be held at Portland on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, September 21, 22, and 23, 1895.

Mrs. Katie Kehm Smith tendered her resignation as secretary of the Oregon State Secular Union, which was accepted. Mrs. Smith also resigned the duty of preparing and distributing the Sunday-school Lesson Leaves. At an adjourned meeting held at the same date and place, Mr. C. B. Reynolds was unanimously elected secretary to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mrs. Katie Kehm Smith. On motion, Mr. C. B. Reynolds and Miss Nettie A. Olds were appointed a committee to prepare, distribute and have entire charge of the Sunday-school Lesson Leaves, and all business pertaining thereto.

W. W. JESSE, President,
C. B. REYNOLDS, Secretary.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

C. B. Reynolds is the duly elected and authorized secretary of the Oregon State Secular Union from this date, June 2, 1895, until his successor is duly elected and qualified. All communications, remittances, and business matters pertaining to the Oregon State Secular Union should be addressed to C. B. Reynolds, secretary, 620 Seventh street, Portland, Or. The state secretary and Miss Nettie A. Olds, lecturer of the First Secular Church of Portland, having been duly authorized and appointed to prepare and distribute Sunday-school Lesson Leaves, all communications pertaining to Lesson Leaves and Sunday-school work should be addressed to Secretary Reynolds, 620 Seventh street, or to Miss Nettie A. Olds, 229 Fifth street, Portland, Or. W. W. JESSE, Pres. O. S. S. U.

A Missionary Scheme.

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensive; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to give and to have given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to have one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the funds and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and have it read.

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who have the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

Great Reductions in Standard Freethought Works.

The popularity of our missionary scheme, by which Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is being scattered broadcast by the thousands, has induced us to lower the price of his other works, with the hope that they too will have a wider reading. From this date the prices of Paine's books will be as follows:

AGE OF REASON. Paper, 25 cents. Eight copies sent to as many different addresses for $1. Cloth, 50 cents.

EXAMINATION OF THE PROPHECIES. Paper, 15 cents.

COMMON SENSE. The argument that did more than any other to convince the Revolutionary leaders of the necessity of the separation of this country from Great Britain. Paper, 15 cents.

THE CRISIS. Paine's great Revolutionary writings. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

RIGHTS OF MAN. Answer to Burke's attack on the French Revolution. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

PAINE'S GREAT WORKS IN ONE VOLUME. 8vo., 800 pp., cloth, $3, leather $4, morocco, gilt edges, $4.50. This book and THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, $5.

PAINE'S POLITICAL WORKS. One volume containing Common Sense, Crisis, and Rights of Man. Cloth, $1.

PAINE'S THEOLOGICAL WORKS. One volume containing Age of Reason, Examination of the Prophecies, Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff, Essay on Dreams, Letters, etc. With Life of Paine and steel portrait. Cloth, $1.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Manhattan Liberal Club meets every Friday evening in German Masonic Hall, 320 East 15th street, New York, at 8 o'clock. Program for June:

June 14th—"Trades Unions and Conspiracy Laws." Moses Oppenheimer.

June 21st—"Spirits." Augustus Watters.

June 28th—"What Are Women Here For?" Dr. M. E. Lazarus, read by Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr.

FRANKLIN STEINER is open for engagements in Iowa during the months of June and July. In August he will start East through Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan. Address him at Box 882, Des Moines, Ia.

THE Detroit Investigator's society meets at 45 Monroe avenue every Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock. All Liberal persons are invited to attend these meetings. Stanley Kleindienst, Recording Secretary.

THE Friendship Liberal League, George Longford, secretary, meets at 2:30 and 7:30, every Sunday in Warner's Hall, Broad and Wallace streets, Philadelphia. Freethought publications are on sale at the meeting.

THE Scranton Secular Union meets every Friday evening at 421 Lackawanna avenue. Our motto: Freedom and Kindness. Everybody invited. Secretary, William Watkins.

THE Fellowship for Ethical Research meets Wednesdays at 8.15 P.M., at Mercantile Library Hall, Tenth below Market street, Philadelphia.

THE Women's Liberal League of Philadelphia meets at 8 o'clock Tuesday evenings in the Skerrett Building, N. E. corner of Ridge avenue and Green street. Admission free. All welcome.

THE First Secular Church of Portland meets in Labo Hall, Union Block, corner First and Stark streets, regularly every Sunday evening at 7.45. Nettie A. Olds, lecturer. Sunday-school at same place at 12.30.

No Mistaking the Day.

"My son," said the pious gentleman to the boy who was playing leap frog in the front yard, "don't you know this is Sunday?"

"You're right, I do!" shouted the boy. "Mammy's gone to camp meetin', sister's run off with a book agent, all the groceries is gone, the baby's in the back yard eatin' clay, and dad's smokin' an' a-cussin' of the Methodists!" —Atlanta Constitution.

A Startling Accusation.

It has become an axiom among promoters of questionable projects that the religious press of all class publications is the most easily satisfied to accept the advertisement of their wares. Humbugs and frauds which even the daily press reject as unfit for its columns are often greedily sought after by the editors of religious papers of easy conscience simply because of the financial returns which they bring.—Electricity.

Another Physician Wants It.

HENDRICKSON, Mo., May 24, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3. Send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, and the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book," as per advertisement.

H. C. DAVIDSON (M.D.).

A Little at a Time.

SCRANTON, May 25, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1 for four months' continuance of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I have so many bills to meet that I hardly know how to spare $3 now for one year's subscription, but I shall have to be a great deal poorer before I can do without the paper.

C. L. TOBEY.

Well Satisfied.

CLEVELAND, O., May 27, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER and "Pictorial Text-Book" came to hand, and I am well-pleased with both. The "Text-Book" is well worth the money I paid for both, and it should be in every home. If some of our patriotic orders should see it they could not help but be pleased with it.

We Enroll Them with Pleasure.

FARGO, N. D., May 23, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER one year. Please send it to Frank Smith. Mr. Smith is a new subscriber. Mr. and Mrs. Smith are both intelligent Freethinkers. You may send me the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book."

C. W. PRIEGNITZ.

It Would Be a Joke.

OSAGE CITY, KAN., May 22, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: What would fool Christians do if they got what they prayed for? Suppose one died and came to heaven Sunday morning. He knocks at the gate, but no answer. After a while his eyes rest on a notice: "Closed on Sunday. N. B.—Hell is open. No Loafing Allowed Here.—ST. PETER."

Then he would say with Puck, "What fools these mortals be." F. LARKIN.

Admitted Some Facts.

KENDRICK, May 14, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: I had a debate here with an Adventist minister. He was fair, and acknowledged that he couldn't live up to the teachings of his Bible, and didn't think any other person could. I proved by his book that man had no preeminence above a beast. He affirmed that man had no soul; that he was no more than a dumb brute until the destruction of the world and the coming of Christ, when his soul would be trumpeted up out of the dust.

He said the destruction of the earth and coming of Christ was at our doors now. I told him I didn't see any signs of it, and read from my Testament in several places where Jesus says his second coming, and the end of the world, would occur in his generation.

He tried to answer but few of my questions, but said he would be back here soon and debate several evenings with me, and answer my questions. After the debate he thanked me and said he thought he had learned something. I showed that Christianity had done more harm in this world than good, and when it had power it had tortured and killed this world's best philosophers and thinkers. He only said, Yes, Christianity should blush.

Yours truly, NELSON REQUA.

Plenty of Silent Doubters.

AMITY, OR., April 15, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: I see on my wrapper that I am three months the better of you, and as I am getting old, and am liable to send in my checks any time, I guess I had better pay the preacher now. We have plenty here to live on; crops and fruit never fail, but it takes money to pay the preacher and printer.

My liberality has got me somewhat embarrassed at present. I have stacks of Liberal books, which I loan, and which are doing missionary work. From some cause the guides to glory are making but few converts here lately.

The Methodist Episcopalians ran a revival—at least, they called it that—for six weeks, night and day, and got one love-sick girl to join them. The Disciples set in and made a dry haul. Then the Baptists tried their skill, and did as well as the Disciples. If we had a lecturer here once a month who could give the facts and expose superstition, the preachers would have a poor show. Our Methodist Episcopal pounder here is trying every scheme to draw the children into the fold; he has a children's prayer meeting every Saturday evening, and gathers in all the small children he can get. If Liberals should attempt to teach other people's children the absurdities of the soul fallacy, what a howl there would be!

Mrs. Smith, Mrs. Barker, and Miss Nettie Olds are doing a good work in Portland, Forest Grove, McMinnville, and other places. But we have no place suitable for them to speak in here that we can get. There are quite a number of Liberals here if they had some one to draw them out, but policy says "Keep quiet." They fear boycotting. There are more hypocrites than believers; popularity keeps them in the church. I know something about these things, although I never belonged to a church, but am a brother-in-law, and that is the only way I expect Peter to recognize me, if the old woman holds out faithful. So says PAUL.

Wants a Lawsuit.

WEST SALEM, ILL., May 30, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: If the depositions of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John were taken into a court of justice, would they not prove the truth of Christ's crucifixion and resurrection? If not, why not? And why do not the Liberals offer to make such a trial? There are plenty of Christian divines who would gladly impersonate Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, and submit to being cross-questioned, and no doubt Mr. Ingersoll would enjoy the task of cross-questioning the witnesses. I think such trial, if correctly reported, would have more influence with thinking people than all the lectures that could be delivered, no matter how able they might be. Please reply through THE TRUTH SEEKER. ED. FULLER.

[The "depositions" named would no more prove the resurrection of Jesus if read in a court of justice than they do when presented in other forums. Instead, the strict rules of evidence to which they would there be subjected would bring out in a still more startling way their many inherent weaknesses, improbabilities, and contradictions. How much credence does our correspondent suppose would be given in a dignified legal tribunal to depositions written by men whose very names are unknown, and which did not appear until long after the persons whose names it is pretended they bear were dead? But how does Mr. Fuller propose to get the gospels into court? Would he bring a civil suit for damages or a criminal action for obtaining money under false pretenses against some minister who has made the said gospels the basis of his threats and promises? Certainly there is here the chance for a neat little legal fight.—ED. T. S.]

Woman's Triumph over Christianity.

The Christian Endeavor Society held a state convention at Bay City, Mich., March 26, 27, and 28. In the report of the committee on resolutions made and adopted at their last meeting, occurs the following:

"We resolve at this, our ninth annual convention, a restoration of all our previous declarations, and speak with renewed energies in protest against all forms of lawlessness against the home, the ballot, the Christian Sabbath, and womanhood."

Here we have the Christian Sabbath, upon which the Christians themselves are not agreed, placed upon a plane of equality with the American home, the ballot, and womanhood. The Christian Sabbath is not a natural division of time, hence it must be artificial, and the persons who have created it are promoters of the Christian superstition. To demand protection for it from the state is no more sensible, and has no more morality about it, than to demand protection for St. John's day, or Good Friday, or Shrove Tuesday, or for such theological creations as hell, predestination, or the damnation of infants.

One of the speakers at this meeting said:

"Look on Japan, closed in 1859, to-day possessing a representative government, newspapers, railroads, schools, universities [of course inferring these to result from Christianity]. 40,000,000 souls, a clean, kindly disposed, industrious, thoughtful people. Japan is eager for knowledge, hungry for the truth. Six hundred and four foreign missionaries are there; 365 churches having 3,600 members [a little over ten members to a church] contributing $91,500 to missions last year."

"Look on Corea, size of Italy. 12,000,000 souls, 62 resident missionaries, languages mastered, prejudice overcome, favorable to Christianity, crying out to America, Come over and help us."

"Here is China, as large as the entire United States, plus 240 miles out into the Pacific. Population with provinces, 407,000,000, one-fourth of the human race. Every ordained missionary has a parish of 4,000,000; 50,000 communicants are there; 522 organized churches. But China is in the grossest darkness of ignorance, superstition [i. e. non-Christian superstition], and sin. Mandarin Ting said to a French traveler 'Our women have no souls.'"

"In the seaport town of Amoy and the forty towns around, Mr. Abeel found that two-fifths of all the girls were destroyed in infancy, drowned or buried alive. Mr. Doolittle says, 'Perhaps one-half of the families of Foochow have destroyed one or more female children.'"

"Words cannot convey an adequate conception of the low estimate of women in almost all the empires where the gospel has not pervaded and molded society."

This is indeed a terrible squawk about the state of womanhood in heathen lands, from the "Strenuous Endeavorists," as they are called in "Dogs and Fleas." Let's see, it was Jesus, wasn't it, who said: "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" The literal text would lead one to infer that this was said to his mother, but as the spiritual interpretation is the proper caper, no doubt he meant all "womanhood." The condition of women in India and China is probably very much worse than that of women in America, but whatever advantages American or rather Western women enjoy, they have been compelled by the church to hustle for themselves. The orthodox have opposed them at every step, and always will. A.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., May 6, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: I am not a subscriber for your paper, but it comes right to my house, to Mr. E. C. Slye. I read it, and I am a strong advocate of Freethought. A little over a year ago I made a mistake (as a Christian would call it), and allowed myself to think a little, and so since that time I have done a lot of thinking. Now, if you can prescribe anything for my case, all right; but if not, I fear my chances for heaven will be few.

Speaking of heaven, it amuses me when some of my Christian friends try to locate it for me. As the earth is round, and is traveling in space at a tremendous rate of speed, and people live all around on its surface, in what direction is heaven? Some Christians say it is up, because Elijah went up to heaven in a chariot of fire and Christ ascended to heaven. But then, which way is up? No matter where we stand, on the globe, if we look away from the earth it seems up to us. Let us suppose that two men were to go to opposite sides of the earth, or let one go half way around the earth from the starting-place—their feet would point toward each other. Now, if they should make balloon ascensions at the same time, would they not go in opposite directions in space? Still it would seem up to both of them. Why would it not work the same with our souls in going to heaven? If I happened to live on the opposite side of the earth from my father, and he and I should die at the same time, and both should start for heaven, would it not be a long time before we met there?

One more way: Let us suppose that a man should die at noon, and start up to heaven, he would go up in space not far from the sun. His wife dies at midnight (after the earth has turned half over on its axis), and starts to heaven. Would they not travel in opposite directions in space, looking for heaven? Also, the earth would be 720,000 miles further on in its orbit when she died than it was when he died. Just figure it up, and see how far apart they would be if one died in June and the other in December. Would they not be traveling on parallel lines in space about 184,000,000 million miles apart, and in opposite directions also?

It seems to me that any one except an idiot would reject the doctrine of the Christian heaven. Now, where on our earth's orbit is this little heaven situated? Is it like a station on a railroad line? It cannot be much larger in comparison with the earth's orbit. It cannot be a very large place, for the earth never stops at it when it comes around. Have Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, and all the other planets got each a little heaven of its own, or do we all meet outside of our solar system?

A Christian friend of mine (after I had given this illustration), trying to answer me, said that the earth is traveling through the center of heaven. I then asked him what he wanted to go up for, and why he could not be satisfied with the center of heaven? Another Christian told me that heaven is wherever God is. But where is God? Another Christian told me that God is everywhere. I deny that flatly, for, if God made a man in the Garden of Eden (or any other place) after his own image, he, in order to be everywhere, would have to expand to the outer bounds of space. And as there is no record of any such thing, not even in the Bible, is it not a hard story to believe?

I think that Christians ought to locate their heaven first, then find some way to go to it. The god idea demands the heaven idea, for he must have some place to live. If he resides in heaven now, where did he reside before he created the heavens? And what did he do for a footstool before he made the earth? In the first chapter of Genesis it says: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." After he had made, on the third day, the earth to bring forth fruit and grass, on the fourth day he made the sun, moon, and stars. Now, since science has proven that the sun must have been in existence first, in order to give the earth its motion, nothing could exist, as the conditions would not be right. Is not the story of the creation a hard pill for well folks to swallow? Of course, sick folks will swallow anything the doctor may prescribe. Christians are the sick folks and priests and ministers are the doctors. To change the figure slightly: A church congregation reminds me of a nest of young birds that open their mouths and swallow whatever the mother drops in, whether it is an angle worm or a red-hot coal, as they have perfect faith in their mother.

The earth has the credit of producing everything in sight, and no one can deny it. If the earth produces the fine substance of which our bodies are composed, why not credit it with producing the first germs of life, from which everything that has life started? God has only the credit of making the first man and woman. Adam and Eve, then they were turned over to nature. God has never made a man since, nor did he before, so far as we can find any record.

Now, with one suggestion to brother Freethinkers I will close. Why do not the Freethinkers of this country establish a college where young men can be educated for the Freethought lecture work?

Please find inclosed $4.50. Mr. E. C. Slye sends $1 for the Wise Fund and $1 for the Fleekten Fund. I send $1 for each, Mr. Wise and Mr. Fleekten, and 50 cents for a few copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER in which this appears. Yours in truth and common sense, E. K. WOHLER.

Pure Galle.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., May 19, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: The Kansas State Sunday-school Convention met in Salina the first of the month.

The Rev. Mr. Vincent told of "the army of 300,000 Kansas boys and girls marching through life without the influence of the Sunday-school." They also claim 40,000 workers.

It is rather amusing to read the resolutions they passed in regard to rum, etc., as witness the following: "We read (1 Cor. vi, 16) that no drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God; neither any drunkard maker (Heb. ii, 15)." This is calculated to deceive the very elect, for the passages cited contain nothing that by the utmost stretch of the meaning of words can convey any such thought, while we know that all through the Bible rum-drinking is commended. Noah and Lot got drunk and "behaved themselves unseemly." We are told to "giv strong drink unto him that is ready to perish and to those that be of heavy heart; let them drink and forget their poverty, and remember their misery no more." Also that we have a right to spend our money "for whatsoever the soul lusteth after, whether it be for oxen or strong drink;" "drink no longer water, but take a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities." Christ manufactured more wine when the guests were already drunk, at the feast of Cana. There was no unfettered wine in those days; that kind of stuff is the invention of Christians and Prohibitionists of the present day. And so the scriptures don't teach abstinence, but right the reverse, and the resolves and resolutions, "being crafty," hav tried to catch you "with guile." Don't you think your children could get along very well without such "influence?"

And further, they "learn with shame and humiliation that one of our own number, just as we hoped to spike the guns of Satan, viz., the joints, the commander-in-chief [Governor Morrill] of our Kansas division, should step out and seemingly surrender his sword to the liquor interests of the nation, and permit the constitution of the state of Kansas to be trailed in the dust." What brought forth these resolutions was Governor Morrill's remark that he "finds it impossible to enforce the prohibitory law in Wichita, Leavenworth, and Kansas City, Kan.; that Prohibition is impossible in those cities where the moral sentiment of the public is against it."

Then we hav numerous affidavits from Washington county farmers as to how the governor swindled them in fraudulent land grants and drew fraudulent vouchers on the Kansas state treasurer for $500 (as stated in the Leavenworth Times), to pay for an office rented and furnished and fitted up in Topeka, and for services of his private secretary, J. L. Bristow, Charles Hull and Miss Kate Adams, assistants in office, in December last, before he was inaugurated governor, for the convenience of office seekers. Now, they knew the governor's tarnished reputation, and were familiar with his land-grant frauds, which were public property before his election, but as he was "of our own number," they were going to clothe the devil in the livery of heaven to serve them. This is virtually what they said by their actions, and it is implied that they supported him as an organization, knowing him to be one of their "own number." But they should hav known that a rascal is not a safe person to tie to, even if he be one of their "own number," for their "own number" are prone to skip to Canada as bank cashiers with the bank funds.

In order that they may see that we do not wish to misrepresent them we will give the following approximately correct statistics: The Christian population is one-third of the whole; the Infidel population is one-third of the Christian; the balance don't belong to one or the other. We hav, out of 100,000 population, 33,333 Christians and 11,111 Infidels. Now there are 4,050 Christian criminals to five Infidels, whereas, if Infidels committed crime in the same proportion that Christians do there ought to be 1,350 Infidel criminals. What does this prove? It proves that Infidels without the "influence of the Sunday-school" are more moral than Christians, and it also proves that instead of doing what you do for Christ's sake you had better do it for its own sake. The less religious a community the less criminal. Is that not sufficient to prove to you the less religion taught the better? Instead of "800,000 children outside of the influence of the Sunday-school," you ought to admit it should be all. We all hav the same access to statistics, and if you should find that we are about right, is it not sufficient to prove to you that you should shut up your Bible and your mouths and go home?

We hav succeeded most admirably, Mr. Editor, with the local papers since our last letter. My better-half got a hearing in the Salina Union, which you will find inclosed as showing how by coming at it indirectly we can get some very liberal ideas in the local papers. Of course we must offer them some direct and very radical articles, but if we find them weak in the backbone and knees, we must give them something of the kind to splinter them up a little. I also got the Republican to publish William Lloyd Garrison's "Should Free Speech Ever be Restricted?" with a quotation from my article on free speech and a free press. Some time ago Dr. C. W. Stowe had it published in the Salina Herald that the Bible is traditional and not historical. Ever since I hav been here I hav insisted on answering every minister and doctor who made a mistake in science or history. This I claimed the right to do in order to keep them from misleading the young. And whenever they attacked Infidelity or Atheism through the press I set up the claim to be heard in self-defense, that is, in defense of my class, and always got a hearing. There is one singular omission in local papers and we must insist on having it supplied, viz., you never see anything in them about the prosecution and persecution of Liberals. We must supply this defect; tell the editors all about the Wise case, citing chapter and verse, and about Ray Fram and the decision in that case, and who decided it, etc., and all other cases as fast as they come to your notice. As I said before, when a person or class is doing an injustice, tell it publicly; nothing gets away with them faster. Also write to local papers calling the readers' attention to the contradictions and immoralities in the Bible, in the latter case citing chapter and verse, and let the reader look it up for himself. Then give out your Liberal literature and supply the Liberal press with names so that they may send sample copies. Rest assured that thus your efforts will be crowned with success, for you hav created a desire and it will not be satisfied until it has obtained the very best that can be got on the subject. JOHN W. ABBOTT.

Two Subjects of Interest.

HARLAN, IA., May 20, 1895.

JESUS IN THE PENITENTIARY.

In the local item column, "About the City," of Equity, a weekly paper of Santa Barbara, Cal., edited by Melvin Snow, I find in the issue of February 21st, the following curious news: "Sheriff Hicks left last night for San Quentin with Jesus Martinez and Julio Rodriguez, who each hav three years to serve." It is not quite as safe to steal horses now as it was in the days of another Jesus, one of ancient date. The Santa Barbara Jesus might hav claimed the kingship of all Judea, including Santa Barbara itself, with perfect immunity from arrest; but as to an ass, or the foal of an ass—well, California knows how to protect its citizens.

THREE PRINCES.

This is the caption of an editorial output in the Youth's Companion of March 7th. It begins by narrating "a singular story, for the truth of which Dr. Josiah Strong, author of 'The New Era,' vouches," and it gives the Congregationalist credit for the details as follows: The African territory, east and north of Liberia, is ruled over by three nativ kings, who are pagans or Mohammedans. Their heirs hav been educated in this country, one at Williams College and one at Fisk University.

The territory over which these young men will soon rule is large, the dominion of one being equal in extent to the New England states, and containing half a million of inhabitants.

The boys are earnest Christian converts, and it is said that before they returned to Africa they entered into a league promising to help each other in the civilization and conversion of their peoples. One was to inaugurate efforts for their education in the habits of enlightened people; the second was to take charge of commercial and industrial affairs, and the work of the third is to elevate the national policy of the three heathen kingdoms.

The immediate practical work undertaken by these three negro princes is to prevent the importation of whisky and all spirituous liquors into their territories.

One of them, Prince Massaquoi, has published a strong protest against this traffic, which sets forth the speedy ruin wrought among the Negroes in Africa by drunkenness, and appeals to all Christian people to aid him in his effort to save them.

The editor adds that "there is something touching and noble in this effort of three princely black lads to combine to elevate and Christianize their peoples, and to protect them from the liquid death dealt out to them by civilized nations."

It did not suit the editor's purpose, in this concluding clause, to say "Christianized and civilized nations." If these colored scions of royalty are not pious fictions, I wish some kind, sensible Freethinker would take them in hand and give them some practicable advice. Point out to them, first, that it is those same Christian nations, to whom they appeal for aid, that send them both rum and missionaries, and that Christianity, one hundred years ago, tolerated and encouraged such intemperance as would bring a blush of shame to darkest Africa to-day. Next point out to these royal buds that, instead of introducing a new religion, which would probably result in bloodshed and anarchy and further degradation, good statecraft requires that they should avail themselves of the best features of a religion already favored.

It appears from an admission in this article that Mohammedanism is already a favored religion, and if these dusky potentates must hav a state religion as a moral aid in reforming the intemperate habits of their subjects, this, of all religions, gives the solidest foundation. Listen to what Sala says in his Preliminary Discourse, or introduction to the Koran: "The drinking of wine, under which name all sorts of strong and inebriating liquors are comprehended, is forbidden in the Koran in more places than one. Some, indeed, hav imagined that only excess therein is forbidden, and that the moderate use of wine is allowed by two passages in the same book; but the more received opinion is that to drink any strong liquors, either in lesser quantity or greater, is absolutely unlawful; and though libertins indulge themselves in a contrary practice, yet the more conscientious are so strict, especially if they hav performed the pilgrimage to Mecca, that they hold it unlawful not only to taste wine, but to press grapes for the making of it, to buy or sell it, or even to maintain themselves with the money arising by the sale of that liquor." This is the testimony of one who is a Christian and opposed to Mohammedanism. Do Christians decline a maintenance that arises by the sale of liquor? I believe there is no state, nor large city in this Christian land, that does not derive a large part of its revenue from the sale of liquors. I am told that even Trinity church gets a part of its income from those who sell liquors in some of its many buildings. It must be admitted that there is a protest against the traffic, and in the name of Christianity, too; but there is, first and foremost, in this protest an intolerance that rejects and stigmatizes all sympathy or aid that is not Christian. A Christian is a Christian first, and if he can not stamp any reform with a Christian label, it may go to the devil, for all he cares, and he will help to put down any reform that is not so labeled. No, my dear colored sprigs of royalty, you are on the wrong road to a true reform for Africa. Cultivate home genius and put an embargo on both rum and missionaries. We can furnish you with teachers of a secular character to our mutual advantage, but these foreign religion propagandists are frauds. But after all it may be these "three black crows" are frauds themselves, and are only seeking a kingdom not yet in sight. J. K. P. BAKER.

Mortuary—Rosa A. Derrick.

EDDYVILLE, Or., May 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Rosa A. Derrick was born at Eugene City, Or., in 1868. She would hav been 27 years old if she had lived until July 1, 1895. She was a loving, obedient, and patient child. She was beloved by all who knew her. She never was a believer in the dogmas of the church. She bore her illness with patience and fortitude, and died in the full possession of her reason, without the slightest signs of fear. Patient, calm, with love to all, and malice toward none, she was taken in the prime of life. She was a useful member of society, fearless, outspoken, firm, and true to principle; kind and affectionate; always found in the path of duty. No orthodox babbler was allowed to speak at her grave. The ceremony was short, yet very appropriate. More than a hundred friends and neighbors accompanied her remains to their last resting-place. In the coast mountain range the country is new and settlers are comparatively few, yet such was their appreciation of her character and worth that they came from many miles away to pay the last tribute of respect to the honored and beloved dead. E. S. DERRICK.

THEODORE BOWEN.

GOLDTHWAITE, TEX., April 24, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I write to let you know of the death of our Atheist friend Theo. Bowen of this town. As he had no family he lived alone. Judge Geo. Whitaker, lawyer, justice of the peace, and county commissioner of precinct No. 1, Mills county, Tex., a thorough Liberal and Infidel gentleman of good standing, had arranged a eulogy, to be read at the grave of Bro. Bowen in case no other person wished to make a talk, but we had a fine funeral oration delivered by Mr. D. H. Mayar, of this town, a Liberal and Infidel friend of Mr. Bowen. Mr. Mayar is a first-class merchant of our town, and be it said to the credit of Infidelity that for truth and honesty no one stands higher in the estimation of the people than he. I think I will soon get one or two new subscriptions to THE TRUTH SEEKER. The long drouth was broken here by a good rain this week, the first we hav had for six weeks.

Respectfully, W. C. CARSWELL.

JUDGE WHITAKER'S EULOGY.

It becomes our duty to common humanity to commit to the silent tomb the last remains of Theodore Bowen, who died between the hours of 6 P.M. and 6 A.M. on the night of April 17, 1895. He died as he lived, firmly believing that beyond the narrow space of earth in which his last remains now rest, no eye can see, nor any human mind penetrate the future.

That he has passed from us in life no man can doubt. Our old friend lived 73 years of his eventful life on earth. He believed in Infidelity, advocated its doctrines, taught its precepts, enjoyed its principles. He lived a moral life, believed in doing good to his fellowman while here upon earth, leaving eternity out of his thoughts because eternity was beyond his comprehension in this life; eschewed evil, but was charitable to all mankind. He was honest in his dealings, exercised industry through life; was patient in mortal illness, and passed from the shores of time as a child falls asleep; not a sign of agony, pain, or suffering was manifest upon the remains of the dead. He had retired to his usual rest on the night of April 17th, wrapped his mantle around him and gone to sleep, crossed the river of death, and is now sleeping in the great chamber of death encircled by that boundless eternity of which no man knows aught. We, my friends, must, in the near future, pass through the same ordeal. We see him now as he is. In a few fleeting moments he passes from our view, and is gone from us no more to return. He loved his country, and to do good was his religion; a friend to the poor and the afflicted. He leaves no child to mourn his death or to weep over his grave. So it remains only for us to say in the language of one he loved and revered because of his teachings, "Here is hope for the living and peace for the dead."

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers.

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Steady and Stick Do the Trick.

A rush is good in its place, lad,
But not at the start, I say.
For life's a very long race, lad,
And never was won that way.
It's the stay that tells, the stay, boy,
And the heart that never says die;
A spurt may do with the goal in view,
But steady's the word, say I.
Steady's the word that wins, lad,
Grit and sturdy gain;
It's sticking to it will carry you through it—
Roll up your sleeves again.

Oh, Snap is a very good cur, lad,
To frighten the tramps, I trow,
But Holdfast sticks like a burr, lad—
Brave Holdfast never lets go.
And Clever's a pretty nag, boy,
But stumbles and shies, they say,
So Steady I count the safer mount
To carry you all the way.

The iron bar will smile, lad,
At straining muscle and thew.
But the patient teeth of the file, lad,
I warrant will gnaw it through.
A snap may come at the end, boy,
And a bout of might and main,
But Steady and Stick must do the trick—
Roll up your sleeves again.

Words of Cheer.

DEAR MISS WIXON: A greeting to you and all the intelligent young Cornerites. Housed up this rainy Sunday, what better task to set myself than the pleasant one of communicating, through the medium of the pen, my warm sympathy and hearty approval of the young truth seekers in their onward march toward liberty and progress?

Good thoughts, our only friends,
Our wealth, a well-spent youth;
The earth, our sober inn
And quiet pilgrimage.

In each succeeding number of this best of all Freethought journals, bright faces and glowing countenances confront me. What a harvest of ripe thoughts! I notice quite a number of writers from the states of Oregon and Washington. This suggests pleasant thoughts of that tireless, unceasing, and good worker, Katie Kehm Smith. I wonder how many she has led out into the domain of thought? From every side come reports of her work.

"Anleta," by Sadie Athena Magoon, was a pretty story. Mrs. Magoon is Mrs. Slenker's active helper. But the sweet influence she extends goes farther than through the columns of the Little Freethinker.

Good books are necessary for proper instruction, and while I cannot name them all, I would like to call the attention of young readers of science to the works of P. J. Proudhon, a philosopher of great repute, whose biography I will give you some day, with Miss Wixon's permission.

He was an economist, and a Radical of an extreme type, but so clear, logical, and decisive, always helpful to the inquiring mind, that I unhesitatingly recommend him to young and old.

The time has gone by when books are put away upon a high shelf because "unfit" for children to read. Our little ones of this latter-day age have become so fearless and brave in investigation that they stop at nothing; and dear old fogies of bygone days look on in helpless amazement, only ejaculating feebly, "Things are different now from what they were when we were young, you know."

And so they are, and so we have just cause to feel proud of and encourage this "difference." Well, P. J. Proudhon has done a great deal to bring this "difference" about. Teachers of philosophy will praise him now, when logic and reason are needed so much, but emancipated people of the twentieth century will one day awake to a sense of what they owe him, and the name of P. J. Proudhon will live "though the heavens fall." Two of his books, "What is Property?" and "The System of Economical Contradictions, or the Philosophy of Misery," can be purchased from their translator and publisher,

Mr. B. R. Tucker, P. O. Box 1312, New York.

If this was a less intellectual and less investigating class of young people, one might hesitate before mentioning such profound works, but nothing is too complicated, too abstruse or learned, for the readers of our "Corner."

"Science," as our friend, teacher, and editor has written, "is the real savior of the world," and not the least of its teachings are contributions to that department by Miss Wixon. However, her able book, "Right Living," needs no mention from me. All who are able have read it long ago, and those who were not able are lamenting their hard fate. Miss Louisa Iffland, of Port Townsend, Wash., can get a good collection of eastern legends from the writings of Hezekiah Butterworth, entitled "Zig-Zag Journeys." There are about five books in all, I believe, but "Journeys in Classic Lands," "Journeys in Europe," and the "Orient," will give you Eastern lore. These volumes are elegantly bound and gotten up in fine style—large print with illustrations.

However, works on such a nature are generally obtained in book stores. But my letter has grown so alarmingly long that I fear its trip to Fall River will terminate in a trip to the waste-basket.

Cordially thanking my friends for words of encouragement, and Miss Wixon for her leniency, I am,

Sincerely yours, IDA BALLOU,
Porterville, N. Y.

LIBERAL WISHES.

We want the youth of our country
To learn in freedom and right,
Pure thoughts to guard and nourish,
And words to speak of light.

Actions in true accordance Therewith to propagate,
To better the land we live in,
And lessen human hate.

For selfishness and evil
Strangle the nobler soul,
That would grow upward worthy
Of manhood as a whole.

Let none but good deeds enter
The arena, activity,
So naught need ever affrighten;
Seek conscience shelteringly.

I have been so successful in the past few months that I feel it my duty to aid others by giving my experience. I have not made less than $8 any day for the last five months, and have not canvassed any. I put a notice in the papers that I am selling the Iron City Dish Washer, and people send for them by the dozen. They give such good satisfaction that every family wants one. Dishes washed and dried in two minutes. I think any person can easily clear $10 a day, and double that after they get started good. I don't see why anyone should be destitute, when they may just as well be making lots of money if they try. Address the Iron City Dish Washer Co., 145 S. QUITE NEW & UNIQUE

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories; and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to wealth of the leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of special interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies. $1.00

Fifty copies. 4.50

One hundred copies. 8.00

400 Years OF Freethought

By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pp., Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. $5.

With The Truth Seeker for One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

A PARABLE worth the reading
Belike we might hav read;
If Christ had come to Chicago,
But the devil came in Stead.

SIMPSON: "How do you know that your rival and her father will fall out and fight?" Jimpson (gleefully): "They've both joined the same church choir."—Tammany Times.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher: "Willy, you know you will be gathered into the fold some time, don't you?" Willy: "No, ma'am; we don't use that kind of bed since Fido was smothered."—Puck.

MR. BISHOP: "Well, Levi, I presume you don't observe Lent at your house." Levi: "Beg pardon, but I do, sir. In playing cards we use only the black cards during Lent and deprive ourselves of the pleasure of handling the hearts and diamonds."—Boston Ideas.

ELDERLY GENTLEMAN (taking a stroll on Sunday morning, to cabman): "My friend, are you a God-fearing man? Do you give that attention to religious matters which all men should?" Cabman: "Oh, yes, sir; jump in, and I'll drive you to any church on the avenue for a dollar."—Texas Siftings.

OLD man Whipple, the Down East lumberman who paid $10,000 for a gold brick, is not likely to subscribe for the new Chicago daily that is to exclude all accounts of crime from its columns. He says if he "had read more about crime and less of Talmage's sermons," he guesses he "wouldn't hav bought that brick."—New York Mercury.

THERE is another story about children—the story of a Portland boy, aged six or thereabouts, that I have omitted to tell. He went to church with his mother Sunday, and as the contribution box came along she handed him a dime to drop into it. He looked first at the coin, and second at the collector, and then turning gravely to his mother asked in a surprised tone: "But what am I making out of this? Where do I come in?"

Among the miners going to the Black Hills, a party of ten started from Cheyenne not long ago, which lost one of their number by death on the road. They couldn't take the body along, and as they had no means of obtaining a coffin, they buried their comrade without one. Among the number was an "old timer," who was a particular friend of the dead man, and he mourned deeply his loss, and cursed and swore about at a fearful rate because he had to be buried in that uncivilized way. Finally he blubbered out, "I know a good prayer, but if I was to get it off, some of you d—d fools would laugh at me."—Omaha Herald.

A STORY is told of a certain Parson Black who had a hymn of which he was especially fond, and which so accurately expressed his sentiments that he made use of it on all possible occasions. One of these was the funeral of his most prominent deacon, who, though active in the affairs of the church, had, in the business world, a reputation for sharpness and closeness that was not wholly enviable. The services were drawing to a close. Parson Black rose slowly from his chair and, in a voice of sepulchral sadness, said: "Friends, before removing the remains of our dearly beloved brother from this house to the house appointed for all the living, let us join in singing the two hundred and seventy-fourth hymn:

"Believin', we rejoice
To see the curse removed."

WHILE ST. PETER'S BURNED.

While the church wildly burned on that cold winter's morn,
And the priest on the sidewalk was wailing forlorn,
Colonel Billings stepped up with a smile that was bright,
And remarked: "I will give you a beautiful site,
Upon which to erect a new church in the spring,
When the marigolds blow and the bobolinks sing."

As the priest softly smiled in the joy of his heart,
Did the colonel remark, both aside and apart:
"If I get the new church in my region,
Won't I have a most beautiful cinch!
For my land it will put
From ten dollars a foot
To about seven dollars an inch."

READ AND GIVE TO YOUR FRIENDS.

Mailed singly for 10 cents each; twelve of any one, or an assortment of twelve, for $1.

AN ANTIDOTE ANALYZED. Reply to a Christian who had attacked Freethinkers, and exposing the inconsistency of Christians generally. H. C. Luse.

BIBLE TEMPERANCE. Showing that Liquor Drinking is Commended, Defended, and Enjoined by the Bible. Edwin C. Walker.

CHRISTIANITY A REWARD FOR CRIME. Authenticated by the Bible. O. B. Whitford, M.D.

DID MAN FALL? Is the Garden of Eden a Fact? Israel W. Groh.

EPIDEMIC DELUSIONS. A Lecture by Frederic R. Marvin, M.D. Giving reasonable reasons for Religious and other Delusions.

FALSE CLAIMS OF THE CHURCH. John E. Remsburg's most noted work, and one of the most effective ever written by any Freethinker.

FIRST EPISTLE OF BENNETT THE APOSTLE TO THE TRUTH SEEKERS. Written while journeying in and near the land of Yahweh. Containing the best moral instructions of the world from the great teachers of the former ages. D. M. Bennett.

THE GIANT DELUSION. A paper read before the Freethought International Congress at Chicago. One of Otto Wettstein's fraternal attacks on Spiritualism.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY. To which is added a poem on Thomas Paine. One of Samuel P. Putnam's most brilliant lectures. Every Christian who asks the idiotic question, "What Has Infidelity Done?" should be induced to read this book, if he has to be paid to do it.

HOW CAN WE BE SAVED? Was Jesus Supernaturally Conceived, and did he Rise from the Dead? Israel W. Groh.

INGERSOLL AND JESUS. Showing how the two agree. A poem by Samuel P. Putnam.

THE LIMITATIONS OF TOLERATION. A discussion between Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic R. Coudert, Ex-Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, before the Nineteenth Century Club of New York. "Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him." Colonel Ingersoll maintains this, the others deny it. Mr. Coudert is a Roman Catholic, Mr. Woodford a Protestant.

MATERIALISM: Its History, and Its Influence Upon Society. Dr. Louis Buchner.

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE WORKERS. A Consideration of the Marvels and Miracles of the New Testament. One of John Peck's best books.

MOSES BEFORE THE COURT, or The Forgery of the Old Testament. Dedicated to the Clergy. H. J. Seignuret, M.D.

THE NEW GOD. "It is an open secret that man has always made his Gods. They exist in and through him, as the image exists in and through the mirror. Take away man and you take away God—the image vanishes." This pamphlet, therefore, is a consideration of what kind of a God man should make. Samuel P. Putnam.

ORTHODOXY. A lecture by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and one of that great man's best. The subjects considered are: Orthodox Religion Dying Out, Religious Deaths and Births, The Religion of Reciprocity, Mohammed, The Destruction of Art, The Discovery of America, Copernicus and Kepler, Charles Darwin, Special Providence, The Latest Creed, God as a Governor, The Love of God, The Fall of Man, The Atonement, The Second Birth, Inspiration, The Reign of Truth and Love, The Wars It Brought, The Resurrection, The Judgment Day, Pious Evasions, "No Bible, No Civilization," Miracles of the New Testament, The Ascension, Casting out Devils, Necessity of Belief, Eternal Punishment, Some Who Are Damned, What I Believe, Immortality. This lecture is on the famous text, "The Clergy know that I know that they do not know."

PERSONAL EXISTENCE AFTER DEATH IMPROBABLE. L. R. Smith.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS MASS MEETING AT LINCOLN HALL, WASHINGTON. Being the Speeches of Hon. FREDERICK DOUGLASS and COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL on the Decision of the United States Court that the Civil Rights Act is Unconstitutional. Fifty-three large octavo pages, of which Colonel Ingersoll's speech occupies 38 pages.

PULPIT, PEW, AND CRADLE. So long as the Pulpit speaks to believing Pews composed chiefly of mothers, the cradle will be rocked by ghosts and the race will remain on its knees to a devil of its own creation and to a God who is powerless against him. One of Helen Gardner's brightest efforts.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY BETTER THAN ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. M. Babcock.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS. One of L. K. Washburn's best lectures, and it is, like all of his, very good.

THE ROARING LION ON THE TRACK. One of M. Babcock's comical sermons.

SCIENCE vs. RELIGION, or The Conflict Between Reason and Superstition. T. O. Widdicombe.

ST. MATTHEW BEFORE THE COURT. Presenting the evidence of the forgery of his alleged gospel. H. J. Seignuret.

SISTER LUCY AND HER AWFUL DISCLOSURES REGARDING NEW HALL CONVENT. Showing that Convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom.

SPIRITUALISM FROM A MATERIALISTIC STANDPOINT. B. F. Underwood. Written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK. Torture Implements Employed in the 15th and 16th centuries for the promulgation of Christianity. Being the Nuremberg Collection, with specimens from the Holy Inquisition. 28 pictures. The descriptions and reflections by George E. Macdonald.

VICTOR HUGO'S ORATION ON VOLTAIRE, delivered on the one hundredth anniversary of Voltaire's death. Translated by James Parton, author of the Life of Voltaire. To which are added the three great poems of Goethe, George Eliot, and Longfellow.

WAS CHRIST CRUCIFIED? Austin Bierbower. A lawyer's consideration of the evidence of that alleged event.

WAS JESUS INSANE? A consideration of Christ's alleged acts which would lead one to that conclusion. L. K. Washburn.

WHY DON'T HE LEND A HAND? And other Agnostic Poems. Samuel P. Putnam. The title poem is perhaps the most popular of Mr. Putnam's many poems, and a great many editions of it have been called for. The other poems are: The Golden Age, The Ideal and the Real, Not Dead, but Living, Fruition, Hope, Thomas Paine, Nature's Gospel, Address to Deity, and the short poem so often recited with great effect by Charles Watts, Give Us Light.

WILL THE COMING MAN WORSHIP GOD? B. F. Underwood; written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

WOMAN: FOUR CENTURIES OF PROGRESS. A lecture delivered at the Freethinkers' International Congress at Chicago. Considering: The Cause of Woman's Subjugation, The Canon Law and Its Effects Upon Her, Theology Never Helpful to Woman, Invention Woman's Friend, Freethought the Benefactor of Woman. Susan H. Wixon.

WOMAN: HER PAST AND PRESENT, HER RIGHTS AND WRONGS. A lecture delivered before the Woman Suffrage Association of Denver, Col., by B. F. Underwood.

Liberty for Man,
Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

LINCOLN

This is Colonel INGERSOLL's great lecture, printed in a handsome pamphlet, and containing the Century's famous portrait of Lincoln—said to be the best extant. Price, 25 cents.

Gems of Thought.

It is not the rabble-rousing harang that lasts.—Galveston News.

Even as a child every human being should be treated as a necessary, essential member of humanity.—F. Froebel.

JOURNALISM must have more self-respect. Now it praises good and bad men so indiscriminately that a good word from nineteenth of our journals is worthless.—Wendell Phillips.

If fortune brings to pass one of a hundred events predicted by roguery, all the others are forgotten, and that one remains as a pledge of the favor of God, and as the proof of a prodigy.—Voltaire.

THE law, the legislature, cannot regenerate. It has never yet created a wise public opinion nor ordained a good public conscience, although it often outrages both. Moral stamina is not furnished by acts of Congress, decrees of state, or by municipal ordinances. Reformation and regeneration are upward and outward movements of the better that is in human nature, and not a matter of statutory decrees.—Louise Tresscotte.

ADMITTING that for the fanatic some wild anticipation is needful as a stimulus, and recognizing the usefulness of his delusion as adapted to his particular nature and his particular function, the man of higher type must be content with greatly-moderated expectations, while he perseveres with undiminished efforts. He has to see how comparatively little can be done, and yet to find it worth while to do that little; so uniting philanthropic energy with philosophic calm.—Herbert Spencer.

To speak your honest thoughts, to teach your fellowmen, to investigate for yourself, to seek the truth, these were all crimes, and the "Holy Mother Church" pursued the criminals with sword and flame. The believers in a god of love—an infinit father—punished hundreds of offenses with torture and death. Suspected persons were tortured to make them confess. Convicted persons were tortured to make them give the names of their accomplices. Under the leadership of the church, cruelty had become the only reforming power.—Ingersoll.

We fence in the land and wonder why men cannot be satisfied with the slavery of banishment. We confer privileges upon some at the expense of others, and endow those who possess with a contempt for those who are dispossessed. We go to the legislature when we should go to the head and heart. The gavel of the speaker falls upon the passage of an act and the work of the Lord is done. The benevolent are deceived into satisfaction, and the politician has put another element into the sources of his sustenance and tyranny. Meanwhile the people directly affected find the doors they beat against double-barred rather than thrown open.—Horace L. Traubel.

It must be admitted, by men who keep steady observation on the facts of life, that folly and greed occasionally secure fragments of delight and appreciable spells of fair fortune. But common sense reckons one experience with another, and strikes an ethical average. And the verdict of the overwhelming majority of rational men, religious or otherwise, has been cast on the side of the life which is conducted on the line of temperance, industry, courtesy, and kindness, and a reasonable preparedness to suppress personal inclination in the interests of a friend, a family, or a community. This verdict has been given on the double ground that morality is essential to the public weal, and tends to the happiness of the individual.—F. J. Gould.

PERHAPS, in some degree, the threats of punishment and the promises of reward hereafter may still be operative, and may, even among presumably intelligent people, be cited as the chief reason for the practice of virtue. I say perhaps, because one sees what small effect they have on the conduct of those who profess undiminished belief in them. For these, practically, moribund motives the Evolutionist substitutes that higher and abiding motif, based on the vast significance of the doctrine of heredity, which alone awakens us to deep sense of debt to the past and of duty to the future. We are each of us hundreds of thousands of years old—"the heirs," indeed, "of all the ages;" we are what we are through what our forefathers made us, plus the action of circumstances on ourselves; and, as with us, so with our fellows and our children. Therefore the future is largely with us, as inducement to cultivate the best and suppress the worst; and if to know that it rests with man to make or mar the lives of others be not sufficient stimulus to learning the true that we may do the right, I know not what other motif will avail.—Edward Clodd.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

A small farm of 10 acres 86 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water, good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes' walk of the railroad station, 9 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes walk. The place is specially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1,000 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest, overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

There was an attendance of some more than fifty men and women, the larger number of them physicians. Speeches were made by Dr. Alexander Wilder, Dr. M. R. Levenson, Dr. R. A. Gunn, Dr. J. Dobson, Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., Eliza B. Burnz, and others. Very strong resolutions in condemnation of compulsory vaccination were adopted, and measures were taken to publish the Anti-Vaccination News by the Society. Among other sums pledged to be raised was $100 guaranteed by Dr. Foote. These are the officers elected for the ensuing year: President, Dr. Peter M. Barclay, Newburg; secretary, Dr. M. R. Levenson, Port Richmond, S. I.; treasurer, Dr. J. M. McKinley, New York; executive committee, W. H. Keefe, Newburg; Dr. C. A. Walters, Brooklyn; Dr. H. Hitchcock, New York; Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., New York; Dr. J. Dobson, Bethel, Conn. The initiation fee is $1 and the annual dues $1.

From the Freethought Magazine.

"The advertisement of that well-known Freethinker and distinguished jeweler, Otto Wettstein, appears in our advertising pages. . . . Mr. Wettstein is worthy of the patronage of the public. He is an honest man that can be trusted. Whatever he agrees to give you you are sure to get, as we have learned by experience. Brother Wettstein is doing grand, good work for the cause of Freethought, and is entitled to the consideration of the Liberal public."

The subject of the above eulogy claims no credit as a writer or scholar; his efforts in that line are crude, and simply the "Musings" of his few idle hours. But he does claim to be a first-class jeweler. Has worked at the bench for forty-five years; is a natural mechanic, art critic, acute judge of goods, close buyer, and does business on minimum degree of expense. His FREE-THOUGHT BADGE is conceded to be the most artistic and expressive emblem ever designed. His "OTTO WETTSTEIN" WATCH combines all the qualities of a first-class timekeeper at one-half the usual rates, and his COLONEL INGERSOLL SOUVENIR SPOON is without question, the finest specimen of the die-cutter's art ever produced. It is his aim now to establish himself as YOUR JEWELER.

BETWEEN THE DEVIL AND THE DEEP SEA.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

What a New Subscriber, Who Has Received His Pictorial Text-Book, Says of It.

LAMAR, Mo., May 8, 1895.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is received, and after a careful examination of the work I unhesitatingly pronounce it one of the most impressive Freethought works ever issued from the press. It will indeed "corner the parson" and all his flock, and I shall take great pleasure in showing the book to my orthodox friends. As a reference book it is invaluable, and it should find a place in every Freethinker's library. Respectfully, W. F. BAILEY.

LIST OF PREMIUMS WITH THE TRUTH SEEKER

When Renewing Your Subscription, Take Advantage of These Good Offers

For $6.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and S. P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" ($5). Large Octavo, 1150 pages, gilt sides and back, marbled edges—the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press. 140 Half Tone Engravings of the Prominent Freethinkers of the past four centuries.

The object of this work is to present the Course of Freethought throughout the Civilized World from the time of Columbus and Bruno to the time of Ingersoll. It is a radical Historic Record of the greatest developments of the human race. It reveals Freethought as an intellectual, moral, literary, social, industrial, and political movement. It shows what Freethought is in itself, how manifold are its influences, and with what promise we can hail its future triumph. "FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT" embraces the most illustrious pages of human history, adorned with the brightest genius, radiant with the most splendid poetry, rich with the greatest inventions and discoveries, and ennobled with freedom's most shining advance. Nothing can be more interesting or more inspiring to the pioneer workers of to-day, to those who are still in the van for human rights and progress. No Liberal can afford to be without this book. It contains the greatest thoughts and the greatest deeds of the greatest men in one harmonious and magnificent whole, a vivid picture of man's sublimest evolution, with the added glory of woman's emancipation from the chains and slavery of a barbaric church.

Darwin and After Darwin

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. The Initiatory Element in Progress.

"The struggle of the ages has been individual selfishness, ignorance, and hate, against collectiv universality, wisdom, and love—and the contest was never more vehement than it is to-day."—Pen and Plow.

It would be exceedingly difficult to crowd a greater number of expressed and implied inaccuracies and downright untruths into fewer words. According to the Pen and Plow, Galileo, Copernicus, Bruno, Voltaire, Paine, Diderot, Spinoza, Carlyle, Bradlaugh, Phillips, Garrison, Wright, Andrews, Bennett, Leland, Seaver, and all the rest of the pioneers of man's redemption from superstition and slavery, were blindly selfish, ignorant, and vindictive, while the stupid and indifferent masses whom they strove to awaken were the champions of universality, wisdom, and love. "The struggle of the ages" has been the heroic battle of a few individuals of wisdom, foresight, and humanitarian instincts against the "collectiv" dullness, mole-like blindness, provincialism, and cruelty of the vast majorities of their times. There has never been a period in the history of the race when, if "the people," popularly so-called, had possessed a tithe of the intellect, enterprise, and love of justice which informed and animated the "individuals" they persecuted and slaughtered, they could not have cast their chains from them in a moment, as it were. But such an hour never struck for humanity, and it never will—that is, the hour when the great majority of the race will stand equal with the small minority in power of mind, devotion to the highest conception of equity, and in tender regard for all forms of life. No matter how high the race as a whole is gradually raised, this will remain true. In a universe of causes and effects it could not be otherwise. In evolutionary development there are always leaders and teachers, and the only real difficulty they have to overcome is the inertia of the bulk of the people. Every discovery, every invention, every innovation in industry, politics, and sociology, has come to the race from the individual—not the individual who was but one of the unnamed units composing what Pen and Plow calls the "collectivity"—but the individual who had ideas and aspirations in advance of his time and was not afraid to run counter to the ignorance, prejudices, and apparent interests of his contemporaries.

Yet all this does not carry with it the conclusion that there is, in the nature of things, a conflict between the rights and interests of the "collectivity" and the rights and interests of the individual, for the existent cannot struggle against the non-existent; the contest is ever between different forms of existence. "Collectiv universality, wisdom, and love," are abstractions; the words describe no sociological or psychological fact; what Pen and Plow calls collectiv wisdom and love is merely the aggregated wisdom and love of the individuals who have approximately similar thoughts and feelings. What has to be considered by the individual who wishes to institute reforms, who would alter the constitutions and modify the operations of various social organizations, is the liberty, capacities, and needs of the individuals who inhabit the country. They can enjoy, they can suffer. But the two abstractions, "society" and "the state," are absolutely insentient; they can feel neither pain nor pleasure. In discussing any proposed measure we have to deal only with its aspects toward the individual—will it harm him or benefit him. When we talk of the conflict between the rights of the individual and the rights of society, we mean nothing more—if we use words intelligently—than the possible conflict between the rights of the minority and the rights of the majority of individuals.

The church has held and holds that she was and is supreme over the individual, but this has meant and means only that the individuals composing "the church" claimed for themselves and still claim the right, under "God," to impose their beliefs on all other individuals. The church is simply a combination of individuals asserting the right to lord it over their fellows who do not accept the same doctrines. There is nothing awe-inspiring in the church, once we are convinced of the falsity of its teachings, except the brute force represented by numbers. A lie believed by one million men is no more entitled to reverence than the same lie when believed by only one man. And, despite all that certain indiscriminating and illogical writers assert to the contrary, the fact that a given dogma is accepted by a very large number of people is sufficient to throw grave doubts upon its assumed truth. History and experience tell us that the masses of men are easily credulous, disposed to receive as gospel what is told them at their mothers' knees and believed by their associates, not equipped for original investigation, and almost wholly unqualified to reason in a logical and consecutive manner, especially where their superstitions and supposed self-interest are involved. The chances are, therefore, that the "collectivity"—religious or political—is always nearer wrong than right as against the conclusions of the dissenting individual.

Startling Admissions by Protestant Ministers.

The Grindelwald Conference resulted in the sending of a letter to the clergy requesting them to preach on Sunday, June 2d, on Church Union, and it is our pleasure to make note of some of the assertions and admissions thus drawn from the lips of God's ambassadors.

Perhaps the most remarkable of these occasional sermons was that delivered by Dr. Lyman Abbott in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn. In beginning, he said that he did not often comply with requests to speak on selected topics, but the subject of church union was one of so much importance that he had made an exception of it, although, if he could have foreseen the warmth of the day, he would have been tempted to choose "a less heavy theme"! He at once admitted that the gospels are not the oldest of the books of the New Testament, when he said that Paul's letter to the Corinthians was supposed to be the first written of the books of that part of the Bible. Even at that time grave differences had arisen in the church; we can only surmise what they were. It would appear, though, that the Jewish element insisted that "the early Christians should observe the Jewish laws, the Jewish feasts, the Jewish Sabbath, should go to the temple and offer up the sacrifice, and should submit to the Jewish circumcision." The Gentiles objected to all this, and so there grew up two parties, one "clinging to the traditions of the Jews, under Peter, and the others following Paul." Next at Alexandria, the "great university town" of the age, where "Greek, Roman, Oriental, and Hebrew thought came together," there arose a sect of philosophers "who were to solve a problem of life."

"These men still exist, even in our times, the men who want to rule the universe. They said, 'We must find out who Christ is.' They said, 'What is this atonement?' They wanted to turn Christianity into philosophy."

Of course Mr. Abbott's kind of Christianity has not tried to rule the universe! But as Christianity was essentially superstition, the Alexandrian philosophers could not make it into philosophy. Mr. Abbott proceeds:

"Already there was a fourth party in the church. They said they did not know whether there was such a man as Christ; 'We don't care if he lived; this story satisfies us. We believe in communion with God, in a living Christ.' They were the mystics."

"Thus there were four great parties in the church of Christ at the outset."

Already four chief sects in the Christian church in the time of Paul! And the adherents of one of them did not know whether a Jesus of Nazareth had actually lived or was a mere idealization! If the Christians differed so vitally at that early date, why should we be damned because we do not know anything more certainly concerning the truth of the dogmas of the church than did Paul's contemporaries? Dr. Abbott has said enough to convince any thinking person that Christianity was purely human in its origin; that it, like every other religion, is the product of evolution, that is, growth. The Plymouth pastor next rapidly traced the course of division in the Christian church subsequent to the time of Paul, mentioning the three great sects, Roman Catholic, Greek, and Protestant, and diverting to the almost innumerable divisions of the latter. In this connection he said:

"The antagonism between churches has been far greater than that between Christianity and Paganism. The Roman Catholics have hated the Protestants, and the Protestants have hated the Roman Catholics more than they hated sin. It is only 100 years ago that in Scotland the Presbyterians excommunicated a stone mason because he helped to build an Episcopal church, and asserted that he assisted in erecting a pagan temple."

There were now to be seen some indications of a growing tendency to church union, thought Dr. Abbott. Read the reports of sermons contained in the Monday papers, and, unless the reporter mentions the denominational affiliation of the ministers, you cannot tell to what sect they belong. This is equally true of Protestants and Catholics, declares the doctor. He thinks that this indicates a growing desire for union on the basis of fundamental beliefs. In our opinion the phenomenon is traceable partly to this cause and partly to the increasing indifference toward religion, as religion; and this indifference is created and fostered by the discoveries in science, by historical investigations, and the wider and more numerous and fascinating pursuits which democracy and industrialism open to the men and women of the present age. But in so far as the manifestly intensifying desire for closer union between the sects and the avoidance of insistence upon petty differences are due to the wish to unite upon the basis of a few fundamental concepts, it is certain that the drift is Romeward. There can be no mistaking the signs of the times, and one of the most unequivocal of these signs which we have observed lately is the next admission, which we shall quote from Dr. Abbott's sermon. Referring to the proposal of the Lambeth Episcopal authorities to form a union of all denominations on the basis of the Bible, the Apostles' and Nicene creeds, the symbol, and the historic episcopate, Dr. Abbott surrenders to Rome in these pregnant sentences:

"In other words, our Episcopal brethren insist that we shall make the church union first on the book. It is not well to criticise an honest and earnest desire to bring about Christian unity, but the more I have examined these Lambeth articles the more I disagree with them. We cannot found the unity of the Christian church on the Bible, because the Bible is founded on the church. The church was founded before the Bible was written; the latter is a record of church work. To build the church on the Bible is to lay the foundation on the superstructure. The church is the foundation, and the Bible has been built upon it. We have tried this experiment of building the church on the Bible. This was what the Protestants did in the sixteenth century, but it did not unite the church. You cannot build the church on a creed, for, as the Bible is built on the church, the creed is built on the Bible."

So Rome has always affirmed, and such we know to be the fact. Protestantism has built upon the Bible, which it received from Rome, and yet it curses Rome as the perverter of Christianity! How does it know that the Catholic church perverted Christianity? What records has it, outside of the Bible, of primitive Christianity, and to what, if not to the Catholic church, does it owe the preservation or creation of the Bible? The Protestant who affirms the infallibility of the Bible merely takes a roundabout way of affirming the infallibility of the Church of Rome. The creation cannot be infallible unless the creator is infallible, and the Bible is the creation and Rome the creator. Dr. Abbott's frank confession will return many a time to torment his inconsistent and illogical fellow-churchmen.

On the day that Dr. Abbott's sermon was delivered Dr. L. A. Banks preached on the same subject in the Hanson Place Methodist Episcopal church in Brooklyn. He said:

"The diversity of denominations is a very great perplexity to some people. They cannot understand why, if the Bible is the inspired message of God to men, all should not see and interpret the message alike, and find harmonious fellowship in the same church and creed."

The objection is a natural and unanswerable one, although Dr. Banks tries desperately to get it out of the way. He should emulate the commendable example of Dr. Abbott, and admit that the only way to prove that the Bible is the inspired word of God is to prove that the Catholic church is incapable of error. Of course that is what the Plymouth minister's admission amounts to in the outcome. Dr. Banks longs for church federation because he thinks that then all social problems could be solved in accordance with the "standards of Jesus Christ." In other and plainer words, he wants the churches to unite so that they can force their interpretation of Jesus's teachings upon all other citizens at the point of the bayonet. Here are his words:

"The tenement-house question, the problem of the sweat shops, the diabolical nuisance of the saloon, the social evil, the wise caring for the poor, and many other questions could find solution if all the Christian force of the city could be brought to bear on them by bringing the standards of Jesus Christ into control in our city life."

Assuming for argument's sake that the Bible (and what it says is all that Dr. Banks knows about the "standards" of Jesus) correctly reports the utterances of the "Son of God," we are compelled to conclude that if everybody followed his instructions there would be neither tenement houses nor any other kind of dwellings, for no one would have ever saved enough to build even a cottage. Jesus both made and drank wine, and wine-making and drinking are antecedent to the establishment of saloons. If Dr. Banks and the rest of the militant modern Christians would deal with the social evil in the way that Jesus did, we would, for the first time, have some tangible evidence of a sincere desire to follow in the footsteps of the carpenter's son. As to "wise caring for the poor," the only scheme that Jesus had for doing this was to give to whoever asked for alms, the ultimate result of which indiscriminate charity must be universal beggary. Jesus knew nothing of the demands of justice, and he did not so much as protest against slavery, the extreme denial of justice, and the stereotyping of poverty.

The Fetich Worshiper.

We once met a fetich worshiper. Of course we have seen other fetich worshipers, but this one was remarkable for his logical consistency and total inability to reason analytically. His fetich was the statute law; it was always to be implicitly obeyed, no matter what it required. We said to him: "Suppose that the law of this state made religious heresy a crime punishable with death by burning, and suppose that your mother should avow herself a Freethinker—what would be your duty in the premises and what would you do?" "If I were in any way charged with the enforcement of the laws of the state it would be my duty to carry into effect this law against heresy, and I should certainly do it; the law is above all else," he replied unhesitatingly and in perfect seriousness. This fetich worshiper was a lawyer, he lived in Iowa, and he was an Infidel.

The man who makes a fetich of the legalized opinions of a certain or uncertain number of men always reasons syllogistically. This is his invariable formula:

"It is the duty of the citizen to obey all the laws of the state.

"This particular statute [whatever it may happen to be] is a law of the state.

"Therefore it is my duty to obey this particular statute, no matter how repugnant it may be to my sense of justice."

He fails to see that his major premise is untrue. The citizen has reserved rights, and when a majority traverses them with a statute, that statute is not binding on any dissenting citizen. This is equally true when a minority succeeds in cajoling or bullying the legislative power into enacting statutes that interfere with the said reserved rights of the citizen. If the individuals who compose the electorate have not, as units, the rightful authority to compel their neighbors to a certain course of action, they do not get that authority by banding together and electing a legislature. One thousand counterfeit one-dollar bills do not become good money by being put into one pocketbook.

The fetich worshiper cannot reason analytically, he cannot reason by comparison, he cannot discriminate. The syllogism is a seductive weapon, and he eagerly grasps it, but it more often cuts his own hand than it injures his opponent. This truth was strikingly illustrated when Father Lambert issued his famous attack on Colonel Ingersoll.

As the Bishop of Seez affirms in his letter to Premier Ribot, "the law of the empire ends where that of the conscience commences;" as William H. Seward said, referring to the statutes that legalized chattel slavery in the United States, "there is a higher law," so we affirm that as against the primary and paramount rights of the non-invading citizen the Sunday statutes and all similar acts of legislation are null and void. They are of no effect; they are not in any sense binding on the conscience; whether the individual will or will not temporarily obey them is wholly a matter of expediency, and he is the sole judge of the expediency or in expediency of either compliance or defiance.

In New Orleans there is at present an hysterical outcry for the enforcement of the Sunday law of that city. This law went into effect on Jan 1, 1887, but it has been practically a nullity until recently. New Orleans has never taken kindly to Puritanic ways, but it seems that she has now surrendered, for nearly all the newspapers and other opinion-manufacturing influences are madly clamoring for the enforcement of the law, "because it is law," as the Times-Democrat exultingly avers in its headlines. Presumably if a law had been smuggled through making it a capital offense to eat meat on Friday these same unthinking shouters would vociferously and with a great show of righteous indignation demand that it be enforced "because it is law." The fetich worshiper is to the front in the Crescent City. He often hates the Sunday law, but either he is not wise enough to know that the unclean thing should be spurned, or knowing it, he has not the courage to say so. Even the daily Item, which points to the struggle of the Cuban patriots to free their island home from the oppression of the Spaniards and to the centuries-old battle for the independence of Ireland, and thus calls attention to the wrongs inflicted on the two countries for the purpose of emphasizing the unmerited sufferings of the people of New Orleans, under the Sunday law, at once stultifies itself by declaring that its position is very plain, that it holds that, while the law should never have been passed, it should be respected. The depth of its fetichistic superstition may be better understood after reading its opinion of the law it feels bound to worship, as law:

"This law was conceived in fraud and born in iniquity. It is the dirtiest kind of a public bargain on record; an offense to the nostrils of this community which they should have been spared, but which certain individuals now insist on forcing upon them. So unpopular is the Sunday law that were it put to a vote to-day it would be snowed under, yet there are those in the community who point to it as one of the best laws upon the statute book."

A measure of respect is due to those who really believe that this bargain-born and liberty-denying statute is a good law, and as such should be enforced; but for men like the editor of the Item, who know that the law is evil, and that it was conceived in fraud, yet who urge that it be enforced because it was tricked into a statute book, the mildest feelings one can have are pity and contempt. The Item knows that one of the judges of its city courts who is active in the crusade for the enforcement of this odious and unconstitutional law is an embezzler. Excuse the slip; we do not mean to say that it knows it, but that it says that he is an embezzler, and it severely blames the committee of arrangements who secured his participation in the recent great mass meeting called for the purpose of egging on the city officials in the work of Sabbatarian persecution. This pious man's love for law as law must be greater than his love for fair dealing with his fellows. In truth, such must be the fact in the cases of all who take the position occupied by the Item, although their personal conduct may not always make the contrast so piquantly conspicuous.

On the evening of June 3d a mass meeting was held in Washington Artillery Hall, New Orleans, for the purpose of enforcing the law as law. Several thousand people were in attendance and the list of vice-presidents was long, including the editors or managers of six of the city papers. Letters were read from and speeches delivered by business men, colonels, doctors, and judges. A fair sample of the sophistry indulged in may be found in the remarks of Dr. H. Dickson Bruns and the city magistrate accused by the Item of the crime of embezzlement. Dr. Bruns said that among the people whose love of liberty had been conspicuous were the Scottish Covenanters. His illustration was very unfortunate for his argument. The Covenanters indeed fought bravely for their own rights, but Dr. Bruns forgets that their courage was displayed in open defiance of laws made for their government by the sovereign power of their country. They held their conscience rights paramount to the authority of the lawmakers. If they had submitted as tamely as Dr. Bruns asks the people of New Orleans to do to invasive and cruel laws they would have sunk into deserved oblivion. And the doctor also forgets that in this country they have made themselves the leaders in the movement to transform the civil republic into a theological despotism. The Times-Democrat thus summarizes one of the doctor's arguments:

"As far as he was concerned, he did not approve of the Sunday law as written upon the statute books of Louisiana. He had no hesitancy in pronouncing his own disapproval of the law; but the people made that law, as well as all the other laws of the state, and they were bound by the duties of citizenship to live up to and uphold these laws."

This is fetich worship in its purity. When the citizen consents to the infliction of a wrong on another citizen he undermines social order and security, for if one citizen may be safely invaded under the ægis of the law, any other and all may be, and chaos comes again. As the state is composed of individual citizens, the denial of the rights of any of them is the denial of the rights of all of them and is a direct and fatal attack upon the state itself, as a mutual protective association. Unless it protects the rights of the minority (numerically or otherwise considered) it is a total failure, for it has no other legitimate reason for existence, as it is self-evident that the majority, that is, the stronger party, can take care of itself in any event. According to the Item the people did not make the Sunday law—it was the creation of chicanery and corruption—but even admitting, for argument's sake, that they did, Dr. Bruns' conclusion that they are all therefore bound to respect it by no means follows. Suppose that the Protestant majority should vote to drive all Catholics out of the state, would Dr. Bruns advocate the enforcement of the law, on the ground that "the duties of citizenship" required the acquiescence of all citizens, including the Catholic minority, in the legalized outrage? Or if the Christians should combine to imprison or banish all Freethinkers, or the Democrats decree the confiscation of the property of all Republicans, would Dr. Bruns and his fellow fetish-worshippers still contend that the law was to be enforced because it was law?

The magistrate before mentioned said that the most impertinent of men was he who would deliberately violate any law, and he needed no resolutions to tell him his duty when Sabbath-breakers were brought into his court. The magistrate of old Salisbury, in Massachusetts, must be a monster in the eyes of the New Orleans judge. "Impertinent" would be a weak word indeed to describe his offense when he tore up the commitment which ordered him to have the Quaker woman, brought to his town at the cart's tail, whipped on the bare back by his constable. This old-time contemner of fetiches said that no warrant was good for whipping women in Salisbury town. We may be prejudiced in favor of human liberty and dignity, but, be that as it may, it is our candid opinion that one such magistrate as he of Salisbury does more to humanize and civilize the world than a hundred million Judge Whitakers of New Orleans.

The whole creed of the fetish worshiper is summed up in this brief statement: The legislature can, by a majority vote—sincerely given or bought, it matters not—make that a crime which before was without moral color, or a virtue even, and it can likewise make that moral and non-invasive which before was without merit, or even a crime.

The Fleckten School Case in Minnesota.

Mr. Elias Steenerson, of Crookston, Polk county, Minnesota, informs us that he has carefully investigated the case of our friend and subscriber, Mr. S. J. Fleckten, of Kandiyohi, in that state, and is satisfied that there is abundant reason for taking up the matter and carrying it to the highest courts that can be reached. Mr. Fleckten has been wronged, and the wrong done to him is a wrong done to every other Freethinker and other secularist in Minnesota. No less does it interest all friends of liberty in every part of this country, and we are convinced that they should all take hold and help establish his equal rights as an American citizen. An able attorney of Crookston writes to Mr. Steenerson as follows:

"I have considered the grievances complained of by Mr. S. J. Fleckten, a resident and tax-payer of School District No. 61, in the county of Kandiyohi and state of Minnesota, which briefly stated are as follows: Mr. Fleckten, who resides in School District No. 61, Kandiyohi county, Minn., is assessed and pays taxes for the support and maintenance of the school in said district, and has his children in attendance upon the school therein. On the seventh day of December, 1894, at a special meeting of the voters of that district, the book commonly known as the 'Bible' was adopted and designated as a text-book for that school, and the same was required to be and was thereafter read every morning by the teacher of the school to the pupils as an opening exercise; and it was also further decided by the majority vote of the meeting that Mr. Fleckten, who had theretofore requested the discontinuance of the reading of the Bible in the school, desist from his opposition to the reading of the same therein.

"I shall now proceed to answer your question as to whether or not the action taken by the members of the district in adopting the Bible as a text-book and requiring it to be read can be sustained. If it cannot, then Mr. Fleckten has a remedy to prevent the board of trustees from requiring its continuance.

"First of all, then, we must look to the constitution of our state in order intelligently to determine what is and what is not permitted in this behalf. Section 16, article I., provides: 'Nor shall any man be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship'; and subdivision 2 of section 3 of article VIII., 'But in no case shall the moneys derived as aforesaid, or any portion thereof, or any public moneys or property, be appropriated or used for the support of any school wherein the distinctive doctrines, creed, or tenets of any particular Christian or other religious sect are promulgated or taught.'

"The simple question now arises, Is the reading of the Bible in the schools, without exposition or comment, sectarian instruction within the meaning of the constitutional inhibitions just quoted? If it is, then the taxpayer is compelled to 'erect and support a place of worship' and the public moneys and the property of the state are wrongfully diverted for the support and maintenance of a 'school wherein the distinctive doctrines, creeds, or tenets of a particular religion are taught.'

"This precise point came before the supreme court of the state of Wisconsin a few years ago, and that court decided, under constitutional provisions varying in no material respect from our own, that the book known as the Bible was one of which the courts took judicial notice, and that the courts took judicial notice of the fact that the peculiar doctrines of the various sects, with very few exceptions, are founded upon the contents of the Bible, and that it was a matter of common history, of which the courts always took notice, that the mere reading of the Bible without exposition or comment had converted thousands of persons from one creed or sect to another. The reading of the Bible, therefore, constituted sectarian instruction and at once turned the school house, for the time being, into a place of worship and compelled the tax-payer, contrary to the protection placed around him by the constitution of his state, to erect and support a religious institution. The first clause of our constitution just quoted is to the effect that no man shall be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship. Under this clause I quote from the opinion of the court of a sister state in a recent case before it:

"Is the stated reading of the Bible in the public schools as a text-book 'worship' within the meaning of this clause? As indicated in the clause already considered, the word 'worship,' as here used, includes any and every mode of worshipping Almighty God. Webster has defined it as 'the act of paying divine honors to the Supreme Being; religious reverence and homage; adoration paid to God or a being viewed as God. . . . The worship of God is an eminent part of religion, and prayer is a chief part of religious worship.' Certainly the reading of the holy scriptures as the eternal word of God, in obedience to the often-repeated injunctions therein contained, whether by the individual in private, or in the family, or in the public assembly, is an essential part of divine worship. Every sermon is based upon some text of scripture. Most prayers are preceded by the reading of some passage of scripture as an intelligent guide to the thoughts of the worshippers. The Sermon on the Mount contains the prayer taught by the Lord. Is it possible for any genuine believer in the Christian religion to read or listen to the reading of that Sermon, and especially that prayer, without being filled with a sense of holy honor, reverence, adoration, and homage to Almighty God, which is the very essence of worship? We must hold that the stated reading of the Bible in the public schools as a text-book may be worship within the meaning of the clause of the constitution under consideration herein. If, then, such reading of the Bible is worship, can there be any doubt that the school room in which it is so statedly read is a 'place of worship' within the meaning of the same clause of the constitution? . . . Manifestly, the words 'place of worship,' very advisedly used, are applicable to any 'place' or structure where worship is statedly held, and which the citizen is 'compelled to attend' or the tax-payers are compelled 'to erect or support.' The fact that only a small fraction of the school hours is devoted to such worship in no way justifies such use as against an objecting tax-payer. If the right be conceded, then the length of time devoted becomes a matter of discretion. If such right does not exist, then any length of time, however short, is forbidden. The relators, as tax-payers of the district, were compelled to aid in the erection of the school building in question, and also to aid in the support of the school maintained therein. Being thus compelled to aid in such erection and support, they have legal right to object to its being used as a 'place of worship.'

"It is no defense that the children of any particular objecting tax-payer are not compelled to 'attend' during the reading of the Bible as maintained by the board in this district. This point has been squarely passed upon by the courts of highest authority, which said:

"The practice of reading the Bible in such schools can receive no sanction from the fact that pupils are not compelled to remain in the schools while it is read; for the withdrawal of a portion of them at such times would tend to destroy the equality and uniformity of treatment of the pupils sought to be established and protected by the constitution."

"The foregoing considerations fully dispose of the matter, in favor of Mr. Fleckten, and he has a right to have the practice adopted by the board of education in his district enjoined from further continuance. The principles herein stated are supported by the weight of authority, and the courts of some states, even in the absence of constitutional provisions like our own, have declared the reading of the Bible improper, in the public schools, for the reason that it violated the natural rights of the individual, and was therefore contrary to the plainest principles of public policy."

We learn from Mr. Steenerson that it will cost in the neighborhood of $250 to prosecute this suit to a conclusion. Now, the practical question is, Will the Freethinkers of the country subscribe this comparatively small sum to help vindicate one of the most vital of the Nine Demands of Liberalism, the complete separation of public education and religion? So far $27 has been sent in for this fight; the remaining $225 or so should be paid in or pledged in a very few days, and it will require but a little from each if all will take right hold. What do you say, friends? Is the banishment of the Bible and other religious text-books from the schools worth working for and paying for by those who know what evils and suffering have always attended the control of education by the priests? We believe that you will make a generous response to this appeal.

Mr. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought."

THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER—Dear Sir: As yet I am not old—being only in my seventy-ninth year. At eighty a man may be said to be "getting on in years." At ninety he may be said to be "aged." At one hundred he may be described as "old." If the term old is to be used at all, it may come in here. Though I am hardly a veteran, I have long taken, and do not cease to take, interest in all that pertains to Freethought, and before this I should have written to you upon Mr. Putnam's "History," had not the all-analyzing, all-delaying influenza interposed between me and that pleasure. The loss of near friends thereby has brought me care and engrossed my time. Mr. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" is in my opinion worthy of the distinction you have accorded to it in your columns. The portraits are no mean additions to the allurements of the text, giving in some instances new and better ideas of the delineated than fame has transmitted. That of Shelley represents not only his beauty of face but strength of frame which he must have possessed. Mr. Putnam's biographies must have cost time and care, industry and research, which entitle him to no mean credit, apart from the clearness and felicity of the information he communicates. Mr. J. M. Wheeler in England has placed us under obligation to him, for his briefer contributions in the same direction. But Mr. Putnam's work is more imposing, besides being adorned by the lineaments of so many whom he describes. The orbit in which I move grows contracted by years, and Mr. Putnam, during his visit to England, may not cross it. Lest this should be so, I send to you the acknowledgments I should make to him personally. If, as Dean Swift held, that he deserves well of mankind who makes two blades of corn grow where only one grew before, he deserves better of the world of independent thought who shows four centuries teeming with vindicators of intellectual liberty where far fewer were supposed to exist. Yours faithfully,

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

Eastern Lodge, Brighton, May, 1895.

Moses Harman is at present in the state penitentiary at Lansing, Kansas, where he is very well treated, the prison authorities recognizing that he is not of the ordinary kind of criminals, not the enemy of his fellows. But on July 1st he will be transferred to the United States military prison at Fort Leavenworth, and it is doubtful if he is given the consideration there that has been accorded him in the state civil institution. However, his friends hope for the best. His attorney thinks that there are several legal points upon which his early release may be secured, and will leave no stone unturned to achieve that much-to-be-desired result. All our friends who are interested in his special work, and also all those others who are jealous of encroachments on the liberty of the press—as what Freethinker is not?—are invited to render such financial assistance as they can in this crisis. Address either his daughter, Mrs. Lillian Harman, or the business manager of Lucifer, Abner J. Pope, at 116 East Fourth street, Topeka, Kan.

News and Notes.

Covent Garden theater and the Italian opera make one of the supreme attractions of London at this season. Through the kindness of friends I was enabled to behold this splendour of fashion without its costing a fortune. The music is superb, and the orchestra is one of the finest and largest in the world. The stage adornments, the magnificence of scenery, and the brilliancy of the acting and singing, make a world of fascination for the lover of art. But besides the imaginary glory there is also outspread a real glory of wealth and enchantment in the vast auditorium itself. Here are the elite of London dressed in rich and royal robes. I was not among them, but over them in one of the democratic stalls, and from this high a gorgeous picture in living colors flashed and moved before me. Lords and ladies with silks and jewels of uncounted value composed the sparkling scene. It was like an immense animated garden, and one could but watch with intense curiosity its vibrating rainbow tints, and, at times, it seemed more unreal to my fancy than the romance of the opera itself.

The next wonderful panorama to unfold before my vision was the Kew Gardens, which I visited on Thursday with Foote and Watts. Even the opera must pale its artificial splendors before these multitudinous flowers—flowers of all hue, flowers of every climate. All that the soil can produce is gathered here for the scientific gaze, and for poetic ardor and love's sweet spell. The Kew Gardens are a great place for London courtships. If a fellow will not propose here, on a fine day, with the beauty of nature about him, luminous as the imagined paradise, he certainly will never do it, and many a vow has been uttered amidst these glorious pomps. The Kew Gardens, although originated for purely scientific purposes, are open to the public, and the throngs on Sundays and holidays are innumerable. It is a gay and festive place, while to the eye of science it is a world of wonders. One is transported, as if by magic, into all the regions of the earth while he lingers in these botanic chambers, where the warmth of the tropics mingles with the breezy north. As you emerge from the glassy palaces the trees and grass glitter on every side in arcades of jeweled floor and roof far as the vision can sweep.

After the Kew Gardens, and a good square meal at Richmond, comes a magnificent drive to Hampton Court, six miles away, across the Thames, which here is a comparatively narrow stream, with green and wooded banks, and embowered mansions of the old English style. We pass through Twickenham with memories of the poet Pope in the mind, who here polished his brilliant lines for immortality. Twickenham is a curious town with a narrow and winding thoroughfare, and houses on either side as ancient as the hills, and great stone walls. I don't like these stone walls, for they shut out many a lovely view, and give England the appearance of feudal exclusiveness, which is not by any means the spirit of the times. I cannot report all the beauties of this charming journey, but the crowning beauty of all is Bushy Park. A wide road, smooth as a billiard table, extends straight ahead for a couple of miles. On either side are four ranks of mighty trees that stand like venerable warriors. Beneath these spreading canopies glows a green sward. Beyond the branching arcades on the sunlit fields are deer and sheep indolently feeding. As we glance forward the vast columns of trees seem to meet and mingle in the mellow horizon, and backward the same prospect presents itself, masses of green sinking into silvery and golden distance in the glory of the occidental sun.

How shall I describe Hampton Court? A "new morn risen on mid-noon," we might say, in Milton's words. Here a thousand thrilling recollections mingle with the pomp of nature and of art. Through the wide galleries and storied chambers we wander; heroes and kings and the illustrious beauties of the olden time shine upon our vision, while from the vast windows of the palace we behold the glittering gardens, the fountains, the silvery sheen of waters, and the majesty of ancient oaks. I can only suggest the massive and brilliant glories of the renowned scenes, the great, solemn building, the shadowy arches, the laden walls, the relics of royalty and war, and the bright and variegated world without. Here the mighty Cromwell reigned in the grandeur of his solitary genius, a sublime energy in the midst of battling factions. I must confess I never understood Cromwell as I did this hour in the shadow and splendor of Hampton Court, when the glowing words of my comrades revealed the hero in his true colors. They studied him and comprehended him from a Freethought view, without prejudice, in the clearness of universal principles; and certainly the gigantic Puritan was an admirable and wonderful character—a man of action, like Cæsar and Napoleon, and equal to either of them in the creative energy of his genius. He was not, after all, a fanatical religionist, but a comprehensiv and tolerant man, the best his time could produce; misunderstood in his own era, and only now being appreciated, not only as the greatest warrior England ever produced, but as its wisest statesman and boldest administrator.

It is the sunset hour; the chimes are ringing forth, and we wander alongside the Thames, where the boats glide up and down with merry passengers. As the great night glooms onward, with its million stars in London's bosom, we return homeward with an added luster in the illuminated chambers of memory.

On Friday morning, with Joseph Mazzini Wheeler, who has read more books than any other man in the Freethought ranks, I visit the British Museum. Mr. Wheeler is named after the illustrious Italian patriot, who was the friend and comrade of his father. Mr. Wheeler is known on both sides of the Atlantic for his learning and his devotion to our cause. I thoroughly enjoyed my day's trip with him, and the objects I viewed were enlightened by his extensive knowledge. The British Museum is a wonderful place. Here is a revelation of vast spaces of human history. Here are relics and mementos from almost every nation. We plunge into the depths of time. There is a vast procession of the ages as we wander through these majestic halls. Here are human implements dating back 4,200 years B.C. It seems that the British Museum knocks out Adam by 196 years. There are mummies and sarcophaguses and monuments dating 3,700 years B.C., and man must have been quite civilized to have produced these evidences of artistic talent and skill in the use of instruments. The library of the museum contains at present 2,000,000 volumes. A copy of every book published in the empire is sent to the museum and preserved. The reading-room is a vast circular, domed hall, in which, I think, a thousand students could be gathered at once. There are desks and conveniences for study. Any one can call for and examine any book he desires. The libraries are beginning to overflow the whole building, and will in time undoubtedly occupy the total structure, and the other vast collections will be removed to other places, as some already are placed in the South Kensington Museum of Natural History, which we also visited. In this is a noble statue of Darwin.

In the display of animal life is vividly demonstrated the process of evolution, much to the scandal of the orthodox party, who protested against such an exhibition of nature's history, but it is too late in the day. There is a beautiful collection of birds and insects, and the truth of natural selection is plainly perceived as we follow the changing species. There are the bones of the ancient whale which, I think, must have swallowed Jonah, since there is plenty of room to hold Jonah if he ever got in. He could walk around and take a nap quite comfortably in that capacious belly. There are also remains of huge mastodons, and of almost all the animals that have ever walked the earth. It is simply impossible to enumerate the multitude of curiosities. I must leave it to the imagination of the reader.

We also traversed the law courts of Lincoln's Inn, and witnessed the solemnities of justice. These courts are small and gloomy, but they hold an immense amount of wigs and dignity. Everything moved in a slow and ponderous fashion. The "law's delay" was pretty well exemplified.

We also took in Hyde Park—the people's park—a beautiful, ample space. Outdoor meetings of some sort are held here almost every day. If anybody is discontented he can come to Hyde Park and blow himself off. He is sure to find some listeners. One does not have to keep off the grass here. No matter how dilapidated one is, he can lie down on the greenery and bask all day in the sun, and he can sleep all night if he wants to. There is no policeman to tell him to move on. This is a vast lodging-house for houseless men and women in summer, and a motley scene can be witnessed in the small hours of the night. We passed by the noted "Reformer's tree" under whose spreading branches many a mighty shout has been raised for liberty and justice. Here Bradlaugh has poured forth his torrents of eloquence. Fashion mingles with democracy at Hyde Park. This is typical English ground. The Anglo-Saxon race has surged here, rough and ready, polished and elegant, in vast variety. Our wandering steps encircle the Prince Albert Memorial that, in gilded magnificence, attracts the view at one of the entrances. It presents an imposing appearance. Prince Albert is displayed in golden panoply as the Patron of Art, and about him are placed the statues of the most illustrious geniuses of the human race. At the four corners are huge emblematic figures of Europe, Asia, Africa, and America.

I can't write any more of London. I must hurry on to Liverpool, where I lecture Sunday, May 26th, and at no place have I found a more cordial and generous reception. I am met at the station by a deputation of the Secular Society, Mr. R. Towers, J. Roberts, J. C. Balfour, Messrs. Woollett and Small, and I have a pleasant social evening Saturday at the home of Mr. E. Newman, president of the society. Sunday morning I am greeted by a fine audience, Mr. J. T. Ross in the chair. In the afternoon Mr. J. Roberts presides, and in the evening Mr. E. Newman. The numbers increase, and I have a crowded house at night, and I never enjoyed more enthusiastic applause. Mr. George Wise, a somewhat notorious evangelist, was present to debate. We gave him twenty minutes for reply to my lecture, "Christ and the Nineteenth Century," but as he did not make a single point, it is no use to waste space on his assertions. There was a ripple of debate at each lecture, but nothing of any importance was elicited from the Christian side. So far as the lectures were concerned, there was almost universal approval. The platform, however, is always free and open to discussion. But the trouble is that the Christian disputant never meets the issue fairly. He dodges and uses words instead of ideas, and his pettifoggery is not worthy of report.

I meet many friends at Liverpool who have known me through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER—Mr. Doeg, secretary; Mr. Charles Stocker, bookseller, etc. It was a pleasure to meet these sturdy supporters. It was the Queen's birthday, and there were processions and celebrations and outdoor meetings, but notwithstanding these attractions a splendid assembly filled our hall, and Liverpool has shown her magnanimous appreciation of America.

I like Liverpool. It is a brilliant, go-ahead city of over half a million inhabitants. It is the next to London in size, and is like to London in its cosmopolitan aspects. The representatives of all nations are in Liverpool. It is a natural gathering-place for every race, it being a kind of universal seaport. The Mersey is a noble river, much like our own Hudson. It is broader and deeper than the Thames, and has seven miles of docks. Here come and go innumerable craft, and the largest ships in the world. There are many fine buildings in Liverpool, galleries, parks, etc. The residential portion of the city is very handsome, and from the river back into the wooded and hilly country extends many a delightful prospect. The city is not built upon a level spot, but upon acclivities sweeping upward from the docks, so that as you traverse the streets on top of the huge omnibuses many a splendid view of the town attracts the gaze.

The friends in Liverpool treat me royally. On Monday I have a red-letter day indeed, a day crowded with the noblest pictures of English scenery and its ancient magnificence. Through the kindness of Mr. Towers I am driven by him over to the olden and beautiful city of Chester, seventeen miles distant. We are accompanied by Mr. W. C. Balfour and Mr. Lawrence Small, who is one of the most active workers for Freethought in England, at home amid the treasures of modern science. I had good company, a delightful day, a road smooth as marble, a fine horse, and England's most superb springtime attire. We cross in the ferry-boat to Birkenhead. They don't have ferry-boats here like our big ones. The passengers go over in one boat and the teams in another, and the boats are small in comparison with our palatial ones. Birkenhead is a place of 100,000 inhabitants, and has a somewhat monotonous appearance, with its rows of houses, and scarcely a green thing to be seen; but soon we are out in the country, flying by the long, green hedges, the extensive fields, the rows of horse-chestnut trees, the white and red bloom of the hawthorns, the rugged oaks and at times the mountain ash, or rowan, with its brilliant blossom. We pass by Port Sunlight, where they manufacture the Sunlight soap. This is an immense industry. A beautiful village has been built around the huge factories, a kind of model village, where the workingman can buy his own home by small installments and enjoy the conveniences of modern life. Mr. Lever, the originator of this vast enterprise, was a Freethinker, I understand, and a contributor to the support of Mr. Bradlaugh. He is a reformer after the Owens style. He believes in helping humanity by industrial methods. After passing Port Sunlight we roll through Eastham, Sutton, and other quiet and antique villages, over which the breath of change has never swept. At Chester we pass under the ancient wall built, I believe, by the Romans. The word Chester is from the Latin word castra, and indicates an ancient camping-ground. The present city of Chester has grown beyond the original ramparts, but these still remain as landmarks of centuries ago.

Old-fashioned streets and houses, overhanging walls, covered walks alongside the stores, etc., meet the view in this stately cathedral city of about 50,000 people. The cathedral is the first object of interest. It was built in the thirteenth century. It is falling to pieces in places, and is now being renovated. It is a beautiful building, solemn and sweet in its voices and pictures of the past, as we wander through its freighted gloom, gaze upon its panels and carvings, its rich adornments, and the emerald carpet and shining trees that greet the blue heaven in the central space of its encircling walls. An ancient verger waits upon us and reveals the hidden beauties. He tells us he has been here for over fifty years. No doubt he loves the cathedral. Its carvings are among the most marvelous and skillful in the world, wrought in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. There was a sly twinkle of humor in the old man's eyes as he pointed out the quaint and curious figures. I must confess I was astonished. I supposed that in a cathedral so imposing, with its dim, religious light, there could be nothing in its carvings but scriptural and theological subjects. Ah me! those old monks had a vein of comedy, and in the very heart of the church the artist had pictured the humors of human life. There were carvings of clowns dancing, of lovers, of Red Riding Hood—a legend, it seems, of the tenth century—of a quarrelsome married couple, with elbow against elbow, as if each sought for more room and neither would yield. There was, furthermore, the final tragedy, when they went at each other with knife and hatchet. There was also, as the verger smilingly hinted, a prophecy of Chicago, a picture of two great fat hogs and a litter of pigs, with the parson coming after his tithes. Well, it was funny to see these humorous displays in the holy sanctuary. Those old monks could not have been such a bad lot when they were capable of enjoying these secular pictures in the very midst of their religious solemnities. The gargoyles on the outside of the cathedral are equally comic and grotesque. One represents Gladstone, with feather pen in mouth, toppling over the Roman dynasty, and another Disraeli in a similar position. I must confess I do not understand the significance of theological art.

One of the most novel things I witnessed in Chester was a picture of the Virgin Mary being impregnated by the Holy Ghost. I do not dare to describe it. I could hardly believe my eyes when I looked at it; but there it was, on one of the main streets of Chester, on a building that must have been erected in the thirteenth century or before. What fools we mortals be! I said to myself, as I looked at that hideous caricature.

Chester is on the river Dee. We watched the salmon-fishing, which is quite an industry here. As I noted the fishermen hauling in the net, the music of the poet's song murmured in my brain, "Across the sands o' Dee." Near the river bank are the ruins of the oldest church in Chester, of the twelfth century, I believe.

At the landing-place my friends charter a steamship, the Volunteer, to take our company up the river to the estate of the Duke of Westminster. Why should we not travel in pride and glory like any grandee of the land? It was a beautiful voyage. We left behind the gracious, venerable city, glittering on the high banks of the river. The prospect before us was infinitely sweet, the placid river, clear and smooth, the green banks, and the softly gliding vessel. Every moment there was a change

Into something rich and strange.

It is indescribable, the perfect loveliness, the solitude, the motion, the city fading from view, and only the winding liquid pathway with emerald splendors on every side, and ever-varying shades of color.

We reach the beautiful estate of Westminster. Here are the stables which produce the most famous horses in the world. Here is the magnificent park, with great trees, and the deer and sheep grazing on the ample green. The residence of the duke seems like a village as we approach. There are the outbuildings and lodges, the chapel and tower, the main structure itself, and the golden gates, and the obelisk. We pass through the magnificent suite of rooms where royalty is entertained, where glorious pictures grace the walls, and statues gleam, and precious stones shine; where there is everything that wealth can buy. The duke has an income of a million pounds a year. He owns enormous quantities of land, houses in London, etc. I believe he is the richest duke of the realm. When he is away from his gorgeous palace visitors are permitted to enter, and the proceeds are devoted to charitable purposes. The duke himself will show visitors about if he happens to be present; and the visitors do not always know who is their guide, and some amusing blunders occur. But the duke takes it all in good part. I guess he likes to study human nature that way. I should think he would want some such relief from the awful dignity of his position, which must occasionally be tiresome. It is like keeping a big hotel. He has accommodation for one hundred guests. He can't spend all his money whatever he does. I don't believe he enjoys himself one bit better than we Secularists did on this glorious day. The great house was just as beautiful to us as to him, with all its gay and splendid surroundings. The voyage in the golden evening from the palace to the city was like an enchantment, as if we were in the realms of poetry itself. The new moon shone out from the rolling clouds as we bowled along to Birkenhead, from whence we could see the far glittering lights of Liverpool glancing up and down the river away to the distant sea itself. And thus passed a day filled to the brim with bright experiences.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Liverpool, May 28, 295

Engstrom Replies to Putnam.

Abridged from the London Freethinker.

In the first place, Mr. Putnam went out of his way to nail his colors to the mast, by defining what he understood by Christianity. He distinctly restricted it to—made it coterminous with—belief in these doctrines: (a) the total depravity of all mankind; (b) the vicarious sacrifice of Christ; (c) eternal damnation. And he added that faith was, for Christians, everything, and conduct and character nothing. And, further, he insisted that his definition was true of historical Christianity.

Under these circumstances, I need not go into the question whether the above stated definition agrees with the New Testament or not, though my criticism would certainly not lose force by such an appeal. A reference to history, past and present, will suffice.

It is surely not unreasonable to appeal for the general Christian view of doctrine to what is par excellence, the Christian summary of belief—the Apostles' Creed. Compare that creed with Mr. Putnam's definition; and, though I am in no way desirous to minimize any common ground, I call upon the president of the American Secular Union to show any justification for substituting his statement for the authorized version. As to how far the doctrines as defined by him are in accordance with or in antagonism to those held by myself, I will state very briefly later on.

For I will now pass from the Christian creed of the ages to consider it in our own times. From the very nature of the case, unless he be a Don Quixote charging against windmills, the creed which Mr. Putnam devotes himself to opposing must be that which Christians actually hold now. He has surely not crossed the Atlantic to attack that which no longer exists! What, then, is the Christian creed as taught in all our churches and chapels?

It has occurred to me that Mr. Putnam may assert that in America the Christian creed is as he has defined it. I do not care at the moment to say what is or is not the prevailing doctrine in his great country. I know that those of my own Episcopal communion there are at one with us here. I know what was the general teaching of the two most admired preachers in U. S. A. during the last quarter of a century—Mr. H. W. Beecher and Dr. Phillips Brooks. I know what is held by a great many leading American theologians, for I have read their books. And all this, which I know, is wholly against any very marked divergence of doctrine, such as could alone justify Mr. Putnam's statements.

Now I return to my own views. As to the "total depravity of all mankind," I entirely object to the phrase; but I entirely believe that the Fall is universal. As far as anything can be known by observation of all cases verifiable, every human being I have known has been sinful. As to the "vicarious sacrifice of Christ," I entirely believe in it, and believe it to be so much in accordance with the universe, as it is known to us, that, did Christianity not teach it, it might appear opposed to fundamental natural laws. As to "eternal damnation," I accept what the New Testament says, but take the words therein written in their natural sense, by which I mean their connotation in the minds of the original speakers, hearers, writers, and readers. [Mr. Engstrom here occupies considerable space with references to Archdeacon Farrar, Dr. Pusey, and himself as authorities for the belief that, as G. W. Foote puts it, "eternal punishment" is not so long as we are apt to imagin] His conclusion is no more than the hope that God will make eternity as short as he consistently can.]

But to return to my main present thesis—viz., the immense difference between Mr. Putnam's definition of the creed and the creed itself, both past and present. How did that difference come about? Well, the only person who can fully explain it is that gentleman himself. Still, one may conjecture that, for his own purposes, he has chosen to name as the true Christian creed that which undoubtedly was for a long time very dominant in America, though never in England or on the continent of Europe. He has, I presume, Calvinism in view; but even in America Calvinism has, I believe, ceased to be dominant. The present danger in America—I speak from the Christian point of view—is not that too much Calvinism is preached, but that its many noble elements are likely to be overlooked and forgotten—e.g. its splendid testimony to the exceeding sinfulness of sin, and to Christ being the only savior from sin.

But I have not yet done with Mr. Putnam's definition of the Christian faith. I have dealt with it as regards the church's creed, but I have hardly touched at all so far on his statement—which it is difficult to quote without indignation—that "faith was, for Christians, everything, and conduct and character nothing."

I have already pointed out that faith in the Bible covers conduct and character; but it is better, because simpler, to ask whether any considerable section of the Christian church has ever held a view so dishonoring to God and so lowering for man. Did Calvinists, when they were dominant in the U. S. A., speak lightly of holiness? Were they indifferent to conduct and character? Was it not the very nobility of their lives which almost commanded what was narrow and untrue in their setting forth of the creed? Is Mr. Putnam so ignorant of the history of his own people as not to recognize that to their indomitable resolution and martyr spirit, and zeal for righteousness and abhorrence of falsehood, the American republic, to a great extent, owes its very existence? Again, he has probably heard of Mr. Moody, a renowned American evangelist, who has more than once visited our shores. Would it not be unjust to the last degree to say of Mr. Moody that he had not with burning enthusiasm declared the absolute necessity of a converted life full of goodness in thought and word and deed?

But, taking the widest view possible, whom has the Christian church ever honored the most? Why, the saints. And what does "saint" mean but an eminently good man—loving, humble, self-sacrificing, truthful, honest, just, temperate, pure?

C. LLOYD ENGSTROM,

Secretary of the Christian Evidence Society.

MR. PUTNAM'S REJOINDER.

I desire to answer Mr. Engstrom in the shortest possible space, and, therefore, I shall not take up all his matter in detail.

He affirms that I am wrong on four general points as to definitions. First, my affirmation that the Christian religion is not essentially a moral system; secondly, that its belief is total depravity; thirdly, vicarious atonement; fourthly, eternal hell-fire.

I propose to show that on all these points I am correct.

In the first place, however, as to authority. I deny the right of Mr. Engstrom, or Henry Ward Beecher, or Phillips Brooks, or Dean Farrar, to give an individual definition of Christianity. I define Christianity by the Bible and the authorized creeds of the Christian church. If Mr. Engstrom will not accept these, there can be no debate with him; for I do not concern myself with his individual definition of Christianity, but with the universal, worldwide, historic definition.

Mr. Engstrom tries to dodge the question by confining the definition of Christianity to the Apostles' Creed. As an Episcopalian, he cannot do this; for the Thirty-nine Articles distinctly declare: "The three creeds, Nicene Creed, Athanasius's Creed, and that which is commonly called the Apostles' Creed, ought thoroughly to be received and believed."

As a member of the Episcopal church, Mr. Engstrom cannot make the Apostles' Creed the sole definition of Christianity. He must take the Nicene, the Athanasian, and the Thirty-nine Articles. I take these creeds for my definition, together with the Westminster Confession of Faith and Catechism.

Now, on the point, Is morality essential to the Christian religion—that is, will the morality of a man save his soul? does it count for anything? the Thirty-nine Articles say: "We are accounted righteous before God only for the merit of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, by faith, and not for our works or deservings."

The Confession of Faith says: "Works done by unregenerate men, although for the matter of them they may be things which God commands, and of good use both to themselves and others, yet because they proceed not from a heart purified by faith they are therefore sinful."

One may be absolutely perfect in moral conduct, and yet be eternally condemned simply because he does not believe.

The Athanasian Creed says: "Whosoever will be saved, before all things it is necessary to hold the Catholic Faith. Which Faith, except one do keep whole and undefiled, without doubt he will perish everlastingly."

The Christian creeds thus teach that morality, simply as such, counts for nothing. Morality is insisted upon merely as an accompaniment of religion, but not as its essence. The essence is faith, and not morality; and it is faith only that saves a man.

As to total depravity, the Thirty-nine Articles say: "Original sin is the fault and corruption of every man; and, therefore, in every person born into this world it deserveth God's wrath and damnation." "Wherefore we have no power to do good works without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working with us when we have that good will."

The Confession of Faith says: "Man, by his fall into a state of sin, hath wholly lost all ability of will to any spiritual good accompanying salvation; so as a natural man being altogether averse from that good and dead in sin is not able by his own strength to convert himself to prepare himself thereunto."

As to salvation only through the merits of Christ—the doctrine of Atonement—the Thirty-nine Articles I again quote: "Works done before the grace of Christ, and the inspiration of his Spirit, are not pleasant to God, forasmuch as they spring not of faith in Jesus Christ, neither do they make men meet to receive grace, or (as the school-authors say) deserve grace of congruity: yea rather, for that they are not done as God hath willed and commanded them to be done, we doubt not but they have the nature of sin."

And again in the eighteenth Article: "They also are to be held accursed that presume to say, That every man shall be saved by the law or sect which he professeth, so that he be diligent to frame his life according to the law, and the light of Nature. For holy scripture doth set out unto us only the name of Jesus Christ, whereby men must be saved."

The Confession of Faith says: "They who, having never heard the gospel, know not Jesus Christ, nor believe in him, cannot be saved, be they never so diligent to frame their lives according to the light of nature."

As to eternal hell, or punishment of unbelievers, says the Athanasian Creed: "And they that have done good shall go into life everlasting, and they that have done evil into everlasting fire."

Says the Confession: "By the decree of God for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting death."

There is no need of further reference. I could quote from all the creeds of the churches to the same effect. The question between Mr. Engstrom and myself is simply this: Will he accept the creeds of the churches or not? If he does not accept them, then, of course, we have no quarrel; for I did not undertake to define Christianity according to Mr. Engstrom's notion. I know not, and I care not, what his notion may be. I take historic Christianity; I take the church's own words. How can one define Christianity except by its own authoritative documents?

Now let Mr. Engstrom say whether or not he accepts the documents. Will he deny the Thirty-nine Articles? Will he go back on his own church and trample its creed in the dust? If so, then Mr. Engstrom is an Infidel; he is an unbeliever, and he will be damned. He is in the same boat with me, and where I go there will he be also; for Infidelity is not a set of opinions, but unbelief of authoritative creeds. If Mr. Engstrom won't accept these creeds, if he throws them to the wind, if he says: I'll think for myself, I'll define Christianity to suit myself, I'll take what I please and reject what I please, then he commits the unpardonable sin of heresy; and if it were not for Freethought he would be burned at the stake. Mr. Engstrom has the right to be a heretic, but he has no right to sail under false colors. He is not an orthodox Christian if he makes the Apostles' Creed the sole definition of Christianity. If he is an Episcopalian, he must also accept, as a part of that definition, the Nicene and Athanasian Creeds, and also the Thirty-nine Articles. If a Presbyterian, he must accept the Confession of Faith and Catechisms. If a Methodist, he must accept the Book of Discipline. If a Churchman of any kind, he must accept the church's documents. If he is a non-churchman, if he rejects the church's authority, its definitions and declarations, let him say so; but the issue between us then ceases, for he is simply one kind of an Infidel and I am another kind. He is a Christian Infidel, a Christian unbeliever, and not a Christian orthodox, or Christian believer.

If Mr. Engstrom does not accept the authority of the church's declarations, then he must admit that I am right; that I have not given a travesty of Christianity, but the church's own definition. I know that Mr. Engstrom does not want this skeleton of the Christian religion brought forth to the light of the nineteenth century. He is ashamed of it. He wants to cover it up with flowers of rhetoric and sentimental poetry and pious gush. He is dodging the question. Like the devil-fish, he makes the water so muddy that you can't see the devil-fish that is in it. But it won't do. History is history, and it can't be changed. The meaning of Christianity is written all along in blood and fire on the pages of time. It can't be blotted out or covered up. I ask Mr. Engstrom to take his stand fairly, and not ride two horses at once. If he does, he will get an awful wrench, and perhaps a broken neck. If you reject these old creeds, say so like a man. Be honest; don't shuffle and wriggle. I have defined Christianity by its public, universal, and historic documents. That is the true critical and scientific method. You would make Christianity merely sentimentality; I make it a body of doctrine as defined by the greatest intellects of the church, who had the courage to say what they meant.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Paine and the Junius Letters.

It was lately mentioned here that some so-called fresh evidence that Sir Philip Francis did not write the "Junius Letters" had been unearthed. Mr. W. H. Burr—who alone, I think, enjoys a belief founded on facts that Thomas Paine was the author of the Letters—writes that the present evidence is superfluous, as he proved a fatal alibi for Francis nine years ago. Mr. Burr adds that he still holds the fort for Paine and defies the armies of Gog and Magog.

Until an author for the Junius Letters is found and stays found, the position of Mr. Burr is likely to continue impregnable. He will be harassed periodically by other theorists, but they will not dislodge him. If one hundred and twenty-five years has been insufficient to decide the authorship of the Letters, the attempt may as well be abandoned and Mr. Burr left in possession of the field as long as he wants it. If there is anything in the doctrine that ownership may be secured by occupancy and use, his title is clear.

I have consulted the Athenæum of April 13, 1895, in which is reprinted the newly-found Junius Letter. The piece is about "tythes" and priestcraft, and reads as much like Paine, in parts, as it does like Junius. I would not suspect either of being its author. The letters of Junius, unlike the acknowledged works of Paine, do not improve on further acquaintance. They peter out. Their smartness is due to a trick, and as soon as you see through the trick you lose interest, or, if you keep on, they repel you. The literary power of Junius was his style, and he over-dressed. He presented his conceits in contrasting colors, striking but garish, and painful if long dwelt upon. Sentences like the following are scattered through his letters:

He was neither an object of derision to his enemies, nor of melancholy pity to his friends.

.....Strong assertions without proof, declamation without argument, and violent censures without dignity or moderation; but neither correctness in the composition, nor judgment in the design.

.....Give us as humble an opinion of his lordship's capacity, as it does of his temper and moderation.

Here is a double-header:

Who, complaining of an act of legislature, are outraged by an unwarrantable stretch of prerogative; and, supporting their claims by argument, are insulted with declamation.

Again:

As your conduct was not justified by precedent, it will never be thought an example for imitation.

Which will only pass without censure when it passes without observation.

The man who, without firmness enough to avoid a dishonorable action, has feeling enough to be ashamed of it.

A little of that sort of thing goes a long way. But the writers of the close of the last century and the opening of this had a mania for rounding out their periods in that manner. I understand that Dr. Johnson set the style of phrase and could not write otherwise if he tried. Here is one from Goldsmith:

.....One of those lights of his character which, while they impeach his understanding, do honor to his benevolence.

And even Washington Irving:

His religion has been called in question by Johnson and Boswell: he certainly had not the gloomy hypochondriacal piety of the one, nor the bubbling mouth-piety of the other.

Paine shows us that he also can juggle with ascending and descending objects. See him send up the words "declaring" and "confidence" and catch "betrayed" and "fears" on the drop:

But such was the overstrained awkwardness with which they haranged and encouraged each other, that in the very act of declaring their confidence, they betrayed their fears. (Address to the Addressers.)

The sentences in the new Junius Letter lack the ornamental twist illustrated by the foregoing extracts, but that proves nothing, for Paine displays a considerable amount of versatility. For example, he roasted George Washington like a rejuvenated Junius, but his piece entitled "Of Monarchy and Succession" smacks of the Covenanter; while his observations on slavery, in the Pennsylvania Magazine, might have been written by Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker.

In Paine's letter to the Hon. Henry Laurens, Jan. 14, 1779, he said that while in England he had the acquaintance of George Lewis Scott, by whom he was introduced to Franklin, and through whom he learned so much about the king and his ministry that he was enabled, in the first number of his Crisis, to answer a speech from the throne before it was delivered, or at least before he had read it. That would seem to dispose of the objection that he did not know enough about the royal and ministerial skulduggery then going on to write as did Junius. The letters in question were begun in 1769, when Paine was thirty-two years old. At that age, like other new and ambitious writers, he would naturally pay some attention to phrasing; and with Johnson and Goldsmith popularizing the peculiar style of the time, it would be stranger if he did not take the disease than if he did. It may be said that the Junius Letters had opportunity for correction by a probably competent proofreader, an advantage by which some of Paine's writings evidently never profited.

But stronger facts oppose Mr. Burr's theory. Junius was a monarchist and had the customary veneration for the English constitution, while Paine was a republican and held the constitution up to ridicule and scorn. In the preface to the Woodfall edition of the Letters, Junius says that he is no more learned or better read than any "English gentleman" should be, which carries the idea that he belonged to the quality; but in one of his Letters he describes himself as "a plain unlettered man." Neither description fits Thomas Paine, who had no use for the gentry, and who, though plain enough, rather prided himself on his literary attainments. In one place he remarks that though he should change his first name to George and his last to Guelph he could never be such a dunce as the king, while the latter could not make a genius of himself by changing his title to Thomas Paine.

I will append some selections from the new Junius Letter, and those who can peruse them and think of Thomas Paine at the same time will be welcome to believe that he wrote them:

For as in medicine, the knowledge of the cause and progress of every disease is necessary for the physician toward effecting a cure, so in religion and politics a judicious inquiry into the rise and progress of any grievance may lead the public, the physician extraordinary of a disordered kingdom, to prescribe a radical and permanent remedy.

I confess I am ready to doubt whether the world would be less religious were there no clerical institutions in it, but every man were left to the free exercise of his own reflection alone, in matters purely between God and himself.

It may not be altogether an unprofitable inquiry how far the character of our national clergy will agree with the qualifications prescribed by St. Paul for those who should devote themselves to the ministerial office.For to what regions of the habitable globe shall we go to find a set of men so detestable as our clergy for their pride, haughtiness, covetousness, intolerance, and conceit?who, instead of rendering any real service to mankind, have been a plague to human society from generation to generation.

The phrase, "the natural Rights of Mankind," occurs in this letter, which was printed in the London Post, Aug. 24, 1773. It will be noted that the Junius Letter period is identical with one in Paine's life not very closely covered by his biographies. So that all the essential possibilities for Paine's authorship of these letters are present, and but two things are necessary to set the matter at rest, namely, (1) some direct evidence that Paine actually wrote them, and (2) an explanation how Junius, the author-coward, who used his gall for an ink-bottle, could ever have risen to be Thomas Paine, the Author-Hero, who dipped his pen in the central font of that vital fluid which warmed his good right hand. G. E. M.

Liberalism: Its Principles and Its Obligations.*

If one of the principal facts upon which Christianity is founded can be proven to be false, the entire system falls with it. And I desire to-night to call your attention to one that, to my mind, science and history have proved beyond question to be absolutely false. I do not believe that it requires any evidence to establish the fact that the Bible account of creation and of the early history of the human race is the most important teaching upon which Christianity must stand. For it is claimed by all Christians that God, in his early dealings with the human race, distinctly pointed to the coming of a savior. Among the alleged indications are the curse pronounced upon the serpent, the prophecies, and the ceremonies and rites of the Jews.

All Christians teach this doctrine, the very foundation, in fact, of the Christian church. Now, then, if this description of creation and early history of the race is false, so is Christianity false. If man has evolved from lower forms of life, it must be false. I have not the desire or inclination to go into the details of evolution, but will allude to only a few of the important facts of its teaching.

The idea of the earth being but six thousand years old is no longer held by intelligent men. Geology has settled this question beyond dispute; its record goes back for millions of years, and can be read from every rocky cliff. The existing records of the human race tell us of the life and habits of peoples who lived ten thousand years ago, while the relics of man's bony frame are found among those of extinct mammalia that disappeared from the earth even longer ago than this. Since man has been able to record the events of his time, it is conclusively proven that the general tenor has been that of progress from the lowest state of savagery, ignorance, and superstition to the present state of enlightenment and civilization. Accurate measurement of the skulls of extinct races of men prove that those of the modern man contain brains considerably larger than those of our prehistoric ancestors. If the brain of to-day is better developed than that of ten thousand years ago, the race is still in the process of evolution. And if the race for ten thousand years or one thousand years has been in the process of evolution, it is just as true that this same process of evolution has been in operation for a million years. If changes in the very frame of man, so great that they can be measured, have taken place in the period of a few thousand years, what, may I ask, were the changes that must have taken place in the course of the innumerable ages that preceded those? If, as is proven, there has been one iota of development in man's physical structure, may we not ask our Christian friends, Why did not an all-wise God make him at first at least as perfect as he is to-day? The Christian world would have us believe that man is a perfect physical being, and that the earth and all that is has been made to exactly suit his existence here. That this is not true, a moment's thought only is necessary to convince one. So far as history records the true condition of our ancestors, it was a continual struggle for existence. Man has always had to struggle against nature's obstacles to his progress. Earthquakes and cyclones, the savage beasts of the forest, and his own savage fellows; the ravages of malignant diseases that have devastated whole countries, and his own short period of existence, all tell of nature's destructive attacks upon his being and his own imperfect physical structure. Races of men have come upon the earth and disappeared almost as completely as though they had never existed. Whole continents have been swept of their inhabitants, as if by a tornado, and the destroyed people supplanted by a superior race. Among the ruins of long-lost semi-civilizations how little is left us to tell of their existence! A few fragments here and there have strewed the pathway of time, clearly indicating that progress has been from the beginning, that the race has evolutionized itself out of intense barbarism and ignorance.

The rule of the survival of the fittest applies with equal force in the human as in the vegetable kingdom, or in other species of animated nature. The undeveloped brain of man can hardly be distinguished from that of the orang or chimpanzee by the most careful examination, and the brain of the largest of these animals is equal in size to that of the races of men having the smallest brains, the Fuegians of South America, for instance, while their intelligence is surprisingly near the same. The similarity of the partition of the flipper of the seal, the foot of a horse, the wing or a bat, or the hand of a monkey to that of the hand of a man is a strange coincidence in view of a special creation, but how naturally this must follow in the process of evolution! Besides, every man and woman carries rudiments of organs that are useful in the lower mammalia, but which have become not only useless to us, but actually dangerous, causing death in thousands of instances.

Man is endowed with only an imperfect physical structure, unable to contend successfully against the impediments nature has placed in his pathway to longevity and happiness, and yet he is the highest form known to nature. The idea that man was created a perfect being in the beginning is the contradiction of nature's own laws. Nature permits no retrogression without destruction to the individual or species. Do not the most imperfect of all forms of vegetable and animal life die before becoming able to propagate their kind? This law of nature is unchangeable, and as enduring as eternity itself. Progress is the stamp nature has put upon all life. All this being true, what is left for our belief in man's creation by a perfect and all-wise God? Every vestige of such belief must vanish as the snow before the summer sun, for our reason tells us that a consistent and loving God, endowed with the foreknowledge of all things, could not be so contradictory to his own nature as to create a world and place upon it the crowning work of his hands with such antagonistic surroundings that its very existence would be endangered.

What, then, our Christian friends may ask, if man is not a creation of God and the doctrines of the religion based upon this belief are false, are we to believe and teach to make the world better? The idea that to the Christian religion belongs the origin of all that is good and true is an error of common belief. Morality has been taught and practiced since man appeared upon the earth, thousands of years before Christ is said to have been born. Morals as taught by the Christian world of to-day are an inheritance from the reforms of all ages before and since its existence.

The secular world has reformed the church. It has forced it to accept many of the teachings of science that it once denounced as heretical, to abandon to a large extent the suppression of knowledge, the tyranny of its government, and its practice of persecution and murder for non-belief in its myths. We hope to teach our religious friends that our belief is a reasonable one, and that we have the same right to act conformably thereto that they have to follow their light. In the bosom of every sane man and woman in existence there is implanted a principle that acknowledges the rights of friends as equal to their own, and by education this principle is extended to all mankind.

To persons who have gotten out of the mental darkness and superstition of former religious belief into the light of Liberalism, life is the more complete and happy for the transition. The world is viewed with broader and more liberal vision. Truth and justice are measured by a humanitarian standard, and morality has a more worthy incentive. All nature is no longer alone for man's use, but he, as a part of the whole, has new and higher duties to perform.

The obligations we owe to our fellows are equally binding upon all, but to a disciple of Freethought there can be no fear of a future hell or hopes of heaven to induce him to do right. It must be from higher and nobler principles than fear or favor. We must know the truth and act the right for the right and truth's sake.

No man should accept Freethought principles with the expectation that by that belief he is to be licensed to vice and crime. Nothing is further from the truth than this idea. He may feel that he has cut loose from all restraint, but his moral obligations have not changed. Freethought teaches the most perfect morality and complete liberty and justice compatible with human rights. We have no fault to find with much that is taught in the Christian Bible, and can stand shoulder to shoulder with our Christian friends in all efforts to advance human happiness and prevent human misery. But we must take our stand boldly, often in opposition to the Christian, to maintain freedom and justice. We have no desire to put one straw in the way of Christians in order to curtail their liberties in religion or politics. All we ask is that they shall in no way abridge our own in these matters. But right here comes the principal warfare we have to wage against the religion of our country. Christians may believe in all the myths, miracles, and dogmas they please, and practice all the rites, fasts, and holy rests they like, but they must not impose their observance upon the people who do not believe in their mythological notions. It seems to be the prevailing idea in the Christian world that they can by law compel people to conform to these practices, and, having no regard for the liberties of others in these matters, they are endeavoring with might and main to enforce them. Should we be so unreasonable as to demand a law enforcing the teaching of some infidel doctrines in our public schools, the Christian world would throw up its hands in holy horror. While we should know that what would be taught would be at least near the truth, and that the teaching from the Bible might be but the superstition of a past age, still we should not claim the right to teach our ideas. And yet this is what they are trying to force upon us. It is the teaching of the church, it is the doctrines of the Bible. It is the duty of the Freethought world to destroy this idea of a perfect God-given Bible. When the human mind can be made to seek light and truth from other sources than a Bible, a rift is made in the clouds of darkness and ignorance that will let in a flood of light and truth whose source is reason and justice. The only possible means in our hands to spread this gospel of truth is education. The training of a child will make it a savage, a Christian, or a scientist. Men and women must learn that morality and justice flow out of the relations we bear to each other, and that no system can exceed that from this source. Morality and justice can have nothing to do with the relations existing between mankind and any God, but only as between man and man. A system based upon this truth can alone be approximately perfect. We must know the obligations we owe to our fellows and perform them because it is right.

A disciple of Freethought must, from necessity, be a much better man in principle than is necessary to make a good Christian. The worst character you know may make a good Christian, but he will not make a true Liberal. The fear of an eternal hell is necessary to compel him to do right. But there is principle behind Freethought, the incentive to do good is from a different and higher source. It is within the man himself. And this principle is not measured by belief in any imaginary being, or an ignorant and superstitious age, but by the broad principles of truth, liberty, and justice.

The Freethought Federation.

The Freethought Federation has opened its new headquarters, corner Clark and South Water streets, No. 5 South Clark street, entrance at 141 South Water street, Room 4. The office is 20x50 feet, with six writing desks and chairs to match. All Freethinkers in the world are invited to call when in Chicago, and make this their headquarters while here. Liberal papers will be kept on file.

Any reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER who would like to make donations of photographs of leading Freethinkers, with which to decorate the walls of our headquarters, will, I am sure, be heartily thanked. Chromos, photographs, steel engravings—well, we would also accept oil paintings.

I have the pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of $5 from W. S. Rolin, Asheville, N. C.; also $1 from N. Gaertner, of Fairmont, Minn., who writes: "Please find $1 for our savior, the Freethought Federation of America, to atone for the sins that I have committed the past six months."

We should like to hear from more of our friends in the way of donations to help pay the balance still due for the publishing of the pamphlet of our last congress. All contributions will be duly acknowledged in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

He Wants Something Good.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., June 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find money order for $3, for which please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER one year and the "Free-thinker's Pictorial Text-Book," as per advertisement for new subscribers.

Yours sincerely, W. C. ROBINSON.

Very Hopeful.

MIAMI, FLA., May 26, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2 to apply on subscription. It is the best I can do at present. Orange grove was killed last winter, but the paper must not stop. "I have taken it ever since it started in Illinois. Superstition is making its final struggle for continued existence, but it will prove to be its death struggle, for progression is the universal law, and mental freedom will yet prevail.

O. RICHARDSON.

Sabbatarianism Always Weak on the Frontier.

PAYETTE, IDA., June 9, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Once more I send in my mite to keep or help to keep the truth before the people. I did expect to send a good order for books, but money is too hard to get. Have just returned from a trip of over 500 miles through the valley and over the mountains of Idaho. On this trip I found the people very free from priest and preacher, for it was quite common to see work going on every day alike. "No Sunday up here," said one lady. "You can do just as you wish—work or play." So I just worked. To write all about this trip would require too much space, but I will give a full account of my next, which will be in the fall.

Yours for truth and justice,

ALVA A. BRANTHOVER.

Backs Putnam's Statements.

BOSTON, MASS., June 9, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER; and, by the way, I should not consider my home complete without it. I think that every true Liberal who can do so ought to subscribe for it. I think it is one of the greatest liberalizing agents in this country, and I shall use my best efforts to increase your circulation in this section, but in these hard times it is very up-hill work. Among the grandest features are the cartoons of Heston. I hope he will live long to continue his great work. Then there are the News and Notes of the Secular Pilgrim, who is now making a tour of the land where I spent forty years of my life, and I know he is giving a true description of the conditions there, and, so far as I know, he is the first American Liberal that has been honest and candid enough to do so. With regards, M. T. RUSH.

More Secular Sunday-Schools.

GRANT'S PASS, OR., May 29, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: We have just enjoyed a literary treat, furnished by the secretary of the Oregon State Secular Society, Mrs. Katie Kehm Smith, who addressed us on the 20th—subject, "What Secularism Has Done for Women." She handled her subject with more than ordinary ability, winning the admiration of all with her kindness, zeal, and eloquence. After giving her audience an opportunity to reply, which they failed to improve, we secured forty-one signatures to the principles of the Oregon State Secular Union, which was about one-fourth of the audience. She also caused to be taken the preliminary steps in the organization of two Secular Sunday-schools, one at Grant's Pass and one out seven miles in the country. And still the good work goes on.

Yours for truth and the elevation of humanity. WM. M. RICHARDS.

Ministers Are Growing.

SKOWHEGAN, ME., June 9, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I see ministers coming nearer to the truth each year, but they do not dare to preach it from the pulpit. We had a Congregationalist minister here, who enjoyed attending horse races and ball games. He was so wicked they sent him away. One of our Baptist ministers raised chickens. His game fighters he named after the different churches, for which he was asked to resign his pastorate. Another said hell was a condition, etc., so they got rid of him. They now have hell in the old-fashioned way, and seem to enjoy it, and I sincerely hope they do.

I hope to attend the Freethinkers' Congress this year.

Find inclosed $3.25, for the ANNUAL and THE TRUTH SEEKER. Wishing you many happy and prosperous years, I remain, Yours for liberty, DR. F. S. BIGELOW.

Going to Omaha.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., June 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I am trying to sell my church pew and to make arrangements for going to Omaha, for that new religious sect, founded by the Rev. John Morrow, and justified by the following passages of scripture, undoubtedly has revealed the correct way to worship God. See 1 Sam. xix, 24; 2 Sam. vi, 20, and Micah i, 8. As the press has informed us, the brothers and sisters worship together in the Adam and Eve costume, minus the fig-leaves. That the new method of worship is fully justified by the passages above, no believer in the Bible can deny; and the only thing I see to occasion wonder is that no one ever discovered them before. To worship God in the proper manner is our duty, and I now have but one object in life, and that is to reach Omaha and do so. While the winter climate will be less suitable there for a skin costume than this, the enthusiasm of the worshipers will doubtless keep up the animal heat. I hope soon to be with them, and my pew is for sale to the highest bidder, and you can say to Brother Orcutt that I am thoroughly in earnest in this matter.

Hurrah for Omaha and the new method of Christian worship! C. SEVERANCE.

What Will They Do Next?

SAN PEDRO, CAL., May 29, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The following is a clipping from the Los Angeles Times:

"SAN FRANCISCO, May 28th.—The ministers of this city have formed an organization for the purpose of compelling the observance of the Sabbath. Churches and parishes throughout the state will be asked to co-operate with the association."

How absurd and odious for ministers to form an organization for the purpose of compelling the observance of the Sabbath! Why, I am surprised that such an organization is born in that beautiful city by the Golden Gate. The more I see the clergy and other professed Christians meddling with this Sunday-law business the less grows my charity in behalf of the church denominations. With Christians who wish to observe Sunday as the Sabbath I have no fault to find. Most emphatically I say Sunday is not the Sabbath, neither is there any scripture that says Sunday is the Sabbath, or that God claimed Sunday as the Sabbath. Neither did the Apostles recognize Sunday as the Sabbath, nor did they keep Sunday as the Sabbath, but kept the seventh day, Saturday, the only Bible Sabbath that ever was or will be. Sunday is a day set apart by the mandate of the Catholic church and belongs to Catholics. Why do the so-called Protestant church people infringe on their sacred day? The Catholic priests will refer them to their Bible Sabbath. Before I would return to the so-called Protestant church and keep Sunday as the Sabbath, I would unite with the Catholic church.

N. A. STEVENS.

Wants the Devil Treated Decently.

NEWARK, N. J., June 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Popes, cardinals, bishops, and priests are preaching economics. They ought to be the last two-legged animals in the world to even whisper it. Clergymen who live in palaces, and are supported by the poor, and pay no taxes, and who have always been a heavy burden to the people, are not very reliable students to enlighten us poor benighted mortals. Questions that are of so much interest to the rich as well as the poor will have to be settled by bread-winners, and not theologians who live by discussing questions of which they are as ignorant as African chiefs. Such people, believing in ghosts, witches, and devils, are very uncertain. Now, sir, of the two, the clergyman and the devil, I think the latter would be the proper person to give instruction, for he is a hustler. He is honest, sober, industrious, and capable; his advice would cost us poor descendants of the antediluvians nothing. He works for nothing, charges nothing to his tenants for fuel or rent, and has never been known to take a rest or absent himself one day from his Vatican below sea level. I have never read of any other person that has been so shamefully abused and overworked, and given no pay, no luxuries, not even necessities. Now, I think it is about time for all persons who want to see justice and fair play to ask those priests to say masses, and ministers to pray for the repentance and conversion of the devil. I know he would join the army of the Lord if he was kindly invited to come, and given an opportunity to do so. If sinners whose sins are as scarlet are allowed to repent, I think the devil should be allowed to be baptized. Now, if I was the devil I would bank my fires and turn my prisoners out, and then those lazy priests and idle gods would have to get their living by the sweat of their brows.

Can Protestant Sabbatarians Dispute This?

SKULL VALLEY, ARIZ., May 25, 1895.

AMBROSE BIEROE, ESQ., San Francisco, Cal., Dear Sir: I saw in an Eastern paper an excerpt from a satirical allusion of yours about "the holy gentlemen who depute themselves to assist the omnipotent in enforcing their version of his law" regarding the Sabbath. You also arbitrarily demand, in just ten lines, "a citation of the divine authority under which the change was made." Furthermore, you don't want "the authority of any council of any church; just a plain law of God plainly and unequivocally repealing the former law," that made the seventh day Lord's day instead of the first, as now. I claim, without fear of disapproval, that I have complied with the spirit of your request (to do so to the letter is not possible nor necessary), on the principle that a principal can delegate all his power to his agent. This was done by God (Christ) as principal, to his agent, the Church. I claim that the inclosed eleven lines (or ten, if you want to be particular) represent the principles on which are based the faith of 50,000,000 of the people of our country, regarding the Lord's day, although all of them do not know it. I therefore demand that you publish these eleven lines (or only ten) without comment, as per your offer. Whatever you do with the rest of this letter don't matter. I will also gently hint that when those 50,000,000 believers shall have received a more national recognition of Sunday than now, and when the God omnipotent shall have his name emblazoned on our Constitution, and Jesus Christ be acknowledged the real ruler of our country, flippant and churlish remarks about "God's constabulary" may result less pleasantly than at present. Here are your lines and law:

God is composed of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. The son is co-equal, co-eternal with the father, and as infinite in wisdom and power. The son has established his church on earth as his agent. That church must, therefore, have his attributes, viz., infallibility, perfect wisdom, and infinite power (Matt. xvi, 18, and John xiv, 17, 26, and xvi, 13). This being the case, God spoke as authoritatively by it as he did by Moses. That church (consequently God) has declared that Sunday, and not Saturday, shall be the Lord's day, therefore it is irrefutable. (Matt. xvi, 19; xviii, 18).

H. G.

For the Priest, No Use in Life or Death.

MARION, N. Y., May 31, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: It has been just twenty years since I got hold of the first copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and for ten years I have been a regular reader. For ten years I exchanged with a man, but since 1886 I have been a regular subscriber, and I have no fault to find with the paper. Many a hearty laugh have I had over Heston's pictures of the saints. What a "scaly lot" they were! I was given the name of one of these worthies; the one that had the coat of many colors. I wish I could corner corn as successfully as he did. I would willingly give a large percentage to the publishing department of THE TRUTH

SEEKER. I shall continue to take the paper as long as I am able to pay for it, and when I stop, it will be a sure sign that I am no longer a wayfarer among the pious.

The fact is that the church offers a premium for hypocrites. A man in good health needs no doctor. An honest man needs no church corporation to shelter him. In nine cases out of ten, the man that puts on the church livery will not bear watching. Look sharp for these young vipers that belong to the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor. I know some of them, and I know that there is no quarter given by them.

I want to go on record as the uncompromising foe of everything that bears any resemblance to the old orthodox tree of superstition. Old theology is like a great cancer upon the bosom of society; the more it is cut into the more it breaks out. We must cover it up with the drawing-plaster of reason, and draw every fiber from the system. Start a new growth; we can only hope to keep it away from the vital places. So far we have succeeded, but it has taken great vigilance, and will require the same for many years. I think the time will come when men and women will learn to reason for themselves. I have no use for the priest or the preacher. I want it clearly and distinctly understood that they must not perform any of their ceremonies over my coffin. I have been a worker all my life, and I won't have any sacred loafer mumbing over my remains. This is my solemn warning, and if among the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER there are any that have these same views, I want them to see to it that this plan is carried out. I am in good health now, and sound in mind, and as long as life is given me I shall fight them until the last spark of hell fire is extinguished and star-eyed science takes the lead, and liberty is unshackled and justice let out of jail to wander in the air of freedom.

J. E. COX.

The Christian and the Freethinker.

MR. EDITOR: All religious sects have their so-called sacred books, their rites and ceremonies. They all profess to believe these books are the words of the supreme being which were delivered to them by inspired mortals. The fact that the Bible contains in addition to moral precepts and just laws, matter that is vulgar, immoral, unjust, and disgusting; that it relates occurrences as sanctioned by God, which are criminal and unnatural; that it abounds in contradictions and fable, is sufficient to convince any intelligent and thoughtful man of the falsity of such a claim or belief. It bears the unmistakable marks of man in a very crude and uncultured state. It tells of times when men were fierce, wrathful, revengeful, belligerent, and ignorant; when men were animal and immoral, cruel and unjust. The Old Testament pictures just such a revengeful, bloodthirsty God as were the men of those times. Truly man made God in his own image. As the world improved and men became more educated and civilized, their God also became more gentle and civil.

The Jehovah of the Christians and Jews is only one of the many gods, and the Christian sect only one of several larger and more important sects of religionists. While the Christians are less important as regards numbers, yet as they comprise the civilized nations, to one of which we belong, I thought it proper to speak of them particularly. In consequence of the many contradictory texts contained in the Christians' Bible, there have arisen about 387 different minor sects of that larger sect. These different branches are continually at war with each other on some point of belief. There is a great temptation for a young (or any man) in search of a rule or guide to a proper life, to become a member of some one of these various denominations. The social, financial, and business interests of Americans, in some particular localities, almost demand it. Freethinkers are not a sect, they are not bound by any creed or form of belief or unbelief, as regards the supreme creative force or forces of nature or the continued existence of man.

They know from observation, from perusal of the bible of nature, something about the mysterious power which from the little acorn brings forth the mighty oak, and from the little drop the powerful elephant; that law which develops the unconscious and ignorant, weak and helpless child into a man of physical and intellectual greatness. We fully appreciate the power which from a small beginning develops the brain of a Humboldt, a Darwin, a Huxley, an Ingersoll, or a Spencer, but we do not attempt to make an image of that power, nor to bow down and worship it. We are satisfied that that power is thoroughly competent to handle his own affairs and is in need of neither our suggestions nor our prayers.

We believe in the works of mercy and charity, in practicing more and preaching less, in temperance, morality, sobriety, industry, and above all things in the saving power of truth. We believe that wickedness springs from ignorance and the antidote is education. We believe that "the time to be happy is now; the place, here," as well as hereafter. The greatest happiness springs from making others happy.

Freethinkers have no God, no savior, no priest—to grant absolution from their sins, hence they have to be moral and just. They battle this life with a brave, unflinching spirit, and stand ready to enter the land beyond the valley of death with the same invincible power.

"How blest the righteous when he dies,
When sinks his weary soul to rest;
How mildly beam the closing eyes,
How gently heaves the expiring breast!"
J. D. LAWRENCE.

Must We All Come to This?

NEW YORK, June 11, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Some three weeks ago, through the medium of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Materialists were informed by Mr. A. D. Swan that, on account of their stiff-necked obstinacy in refusing to accept the philosophy of Spiritualism, they have become bigots equal in depravity to adherents of the church who "would burn those of different views at the stake." If that is so, it is a truth with which I have heretofore not been familiar. Bigotry, as understood, is a desire to forcefully suppress and stamp out, and an utter refusal to tolerate, any opposing belief—a disposition of which I, for one "Materialist," am totally unconscious. It is possible that Mr. Swan's opulence of spiritual knowledge has somewhat puffed him up, a trick which superior wealth is apt to play on any of us if we do not guard ourselves.

He charges us with not desiring to be informed about what "real material" consists of, and then he proceeds to say that after research he finds that "neither matter nor life is, and probably never will be, fully understood by man in mortal or immortal life." I submit that such an experience as that ought to make him more charitable toward those who have reached the same conclusion after similar research. If one who is in communication with the immortals, as Mr. Swan is, brings us the message that matter and life are insoluble problems, how the devil can he ask us, who do not enjoy his advantages, to do otherwise than take him at his word and give up trying to find out what "real material" consists of?

I would not cast doubts, though I have some in hand, on the authenticity of that communication which Mr. Swan reproduces in his letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I would like to present a thought for his consideration. Suppose that his daughter, from whom the communication purports to emanate, instead of being in the spirit world were in this, and residing on the other side of the continent; that he, having a parent's interest, should desire to know how it fared with her, and with a view to finding out should "fool away" $2 on a telegram to her address. And suppose that in reply he should get a "finely drawn sprig" and this message: "Papa, in answer to your mental question I have sent this little sprig in colors as emblematic of our love for you all; as the bud opens so also does our love for mankind expand," and so forth, all in the "best of sentiment," of course, but all blanked twaddle nevertheless. Would he not blow in another two dollars just to tell his girl to never mind about sprigs and buds and her expanding love for mankind, and to write as a daughter should to her parents—something that her old father and mother could read and talk over together and get some comfort and information from? And if in rejoinder to this he should receive another ream or two of flubdub in different words, wouldn't he ask the telegraph operator what idiot assylum his wire was connected with? If not, why?

By abstaining from profitless thought on the subject of death I have come to regard it as a thing to be neither desired nor objected to. It is one of the offices of the body to die, and as the other natural offices come to be performed with no unpleasant sensations, so, I apprehend, will this one. But Mr. Swan's letter gives me terrors to think of. When this "42 stout" person of mine goes under the daisies, is the mind that controls it going off to the moon, to exist in a paralyzed state, and to return in the form of short slate pencils and write slush and make bad drawings of several colors in the presence of a Cook county medium at $2 a lick? This thought contains the sting of death, and herein also does death achieve a triumph. From what I can learn from those who pretend to know about other states of existence, I am inclined to say, Give me this world or give me none. G. E. M.

God.

JACKSONVILLE, ILL., May 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: All anybody knows about God they can put in their eye, while what they don't know, printed in small type, would fill up all the space outside of the eye. The Jewish scriptures represent him as anthropomorphic, i. e., with human form and characteristics. If the scriptures are right the only thing we can infer is this: We know what man is; we know that he is an animal, and naturalists have assigned him his proper place in the animal kingdom and classified him as genus homo, a placental vertebrate. Therefore, his antetype, God, cannot avoid coming under the same denomination of animals. The ancient Greeks were a highly-cultured and intellectual race, and their conception of divinity was far more ennobling than the Jewish, which permitted the free indulgence of human feelings. (See Sir Charles Bell's "Anatomy and Philosophy of Expression.") The features of the Greek gods as shown in sculpture are devoid of anything that would indicate the presence of the human passions, emotions, or sentiments, their creators evidently considering these too base and low to be represented in the face of a god. Instead their carved features are expressive of unimpassioned thought, reason, and contemplation.

The Jewish god is totally different. He sometimes loses his head, gets his suspenders in a twist, and rants around like a Dutch stepfather; he turns things upside down, backside foremost, and inside out; puts poor Dives in the hole without linen duster or fan and not a morsel of ice for his beverage; orders defenseless women and children butchered and young girls debauched, and augments the torture of childbirth. He sets a premium on condensed ignorance, is dead stuck on the dollar mark, issues a batch of promissory notes to condemned murderers, fawning sycophants, and hypocrites; he strangles liberty and wants to be patted on the back. He never caused anything but trouble to his constituency, and never created anything but an almighty big pile of work for the fool-killer. It would take a professor of mathematics to find out what relationship, affinity, or consanguinity he sustained to himself, being his own father and his own son, with the connection further complicated by a ghost mixed up in the trinity.

Let us turn from this spectacle to what has been termed nature's god. Colonel Ingersoll voiced a sublime idea when he spoke of him as one "whose thoughts are stars and whose dreams are constellations." I am sorry the colonel's words couldn't be expanded into a continued story. As a workman is said to be known by his chips, we will have to go to nature for the character of its god.

Looking at nature from a standpoint of justice, we see that we never get a square deal; her scales have never been poised. The big fish eat up the little ones, the strong shove the weak to the wall, and fortune is invariably on the side of the heavy artillery. A fixed law has no conscience.

The ears of pity are plugged, want is neglected, and the calloused hand of indigent toil, heaped with lard, is compelled to grease the fat sow. The dogs of war are turned loose; patient merit is run over, while wasteful exuberance rides on the band wagon. Nature's god is too prolific—more children are born than can be cared for.

One would think that if some are not fit to survive they ought to have been considered unfit to be called into existence in the first place. Whatever glimpses of beneficent design we can desery in nature are more than counterpoised by a flagrant and perpetual miscarriage of justice.

When we come to what has been called "reasoning from nature up to nature's god," we tackle the endless chain of cause and effect, and have a circulating decimal on our hands, "worlds without end."

The old Peruvians, who worshiped the sun, were not far wrong when they called themselves his children. For the sun is really our father and the earth is our mother in more than a figurative sense. Atahualpa, in addressing himself to Pizarro's mob of Christian outthroats, said: "Your god was murdered by the people he had made" (and pointing to the sun), "while mine lives to-day, and looks down on his children" (Prescott's "History of the Conquest of Peru").

But it won't do to make a god out of the sun, for astronomers know there are millions of suns. To get these mixed up with the gods of religion might spoil their reputation. Don't worship any of them, but take them as they come.

WM. PATTERSON.

An Open Letter.

FROM S. W. WETMORE, M.D., TO REV. F. —, PASTOR M. E. CHURCH, ASHTABULA CO., O.

BUFFALO, N. Y., June 7, 1895.

My Dear Reverend Sir: I take the liberty to call your attention to a very objectionable expression made by you as one of the officiating clergymen at my dear brother's funeral a few days since. After eulogizing the deceased's Christian character, virtues, honesty, etc., in a very satisfactory manner, you said, "In fact, a man cannot be an honest man unless he is a Christian." I was surprised to hear the whole moral world slandered by a Christian minister in this enlightened nineteenth century. The expression could not have been a lapse of tongue, for it was delivered with a vehemence designed to impress your hearers. If you were honest in that declaration, ignorance must be your only apology. In that event you are certainly "joined to your idols," and your reading confined to sectarian papers.

I was incensed, first, because I am not a Christian, never was, and never can be. Yet I know I am an honest and an upright man, conscientious in my convictions, true to my moral principles, myself, my family, and my god—the ethical life in nature—and the Golden Rule, which is my religion.

Jesus, it is said, taught these moral precepts. So did Pittacus 650 years B.C. Also Thales, Confucius, Plato, Sextus, Aristotle, Aristippus, Socrates, Epictetus, Hillel, a Jewish rabbi, and many others, hundreds of years before Christ.

So far as the moral precepts are concerned I am a Christian, but not otherwise, for I could never believe in the divinity of any man born of a woman—even a virgin—whose father was a ghost, holy or unholy. Nor do I believe there is a man or woman living, of mens sana, who thinks, reasons, and analyzes honestly, who can conscientiously teach such preposterous dogmas.

Can it be possible that any rational student can believe that a man who once lived here on this earth, with all the passions of mankind, who labored, fatigued, rested, slept, ate, drank, and was merry; one who cursed—even a fig-tree—reviled his neighbors, calling them thieves, vipers, etc., eventually became a God in heaven? Can it be possible that an honest man can reason himself into the belief that a person is his own father, and that a ghost proceeded from the father and son both, and was, at the same time, both that father and son, and that three times one is one? The Aryans considered this story a jocosely fable for hundreds of years, just as we regard the "Arabian Nights," or some of Rider Haggard's mythical stories.

Second, I was incensed, because I know that Christianity has had very little influence in making men honest. Look at the statistics of our state prisons to-day, if you please, and you will find that, according to their records, nine-tenths of the convicts have been entered as Christians.

What an appalling history! Still more appalling is the record of priests and preachers, more than one thousand having been arrested, many of whom were convicted, fined, or sent to prison since 1876 in the United States and Canada alone. Some of their crimes are too revolting for publication. Forgery, theft, adultery, elopement, rape, embezzlement, and intemperance were as common charges as against the laity.

For the crimes of Christians generally, I will call your attention to a little table from prisons reports of Iowa, Michigan, Tennessee, Connecticut, Indiana, Illinois, and Canada. In sixty-six different prisons, jails, lock-ups, reformatories, refuges, and penitentiaries, there were, for the years given in report, 41,335 men and boys, women and girls, of the following religious sects:

Catholics.....	16,431
Church of England (Episcopalians).....	9,975
Universalists.....	5
Eighteen other Protestant denominations.....	14,811
Jews, Chinese, and Mormons.....	110
Infidels (two so-called, one avowed).....	3
	41,335

Were I to give you the statistics of prisons in foreign countries it would be more appalling still. Enough has been said, I trust, to show that it requires a greater influence than Christianity to make people honest.

These statistics hardly sustain the allegation that "a man cannot be honest unless he be a Christian," or that Christianity makes men honest, or that infidelity is coupled with impurity.

Now, my dear reverend sir, you must know that hundreds and hundreds of years before Christ was protoplasm, there were thousands of honest men and women, and that there are millions of honest people living to-day who do not believe in the miraculous conception fable, the atonement scheme, or the resurrection myth.

It is estimated that but one-tenth of the population of this globe pretend to be religious, and but about one-fifth of that number lay any claim to Christianity. If your allegations are true, it must be a very dishonest world, although Christianity has held sway for more than eighteen hundred years. Fortunately you are in error, for that dogma is of local influence, while the Golden Rule guide, or morality, is a general attribute. Do not forget that the Hebrews have a reputation of being the most honest people on earth. It is very rare that a Jew is sentenced to a penitentiary. Read the lives of the great men, or gods, of Persia, China, Greece, Mexico, Rome, Arabia, and India, as well as Palestine, and compare the honesty of these various nations.

I admit that Confucius was a murderer; so was Moses; and that Marcus Aurelius was a liar; so were Eusebius and St. Paul (the latter claimed it was for the glory of God, and they should not be rebuked). Were these representatives honest Christians, or does it require a greater Christian influence now-a-days to make men honest than eighteen hundred years ago?

This letter may seem captious, but I can assure you that nothing but the influence of human duty could impel me to take such liberty. An ethical life has always guided my footsteps. My religion—like Thomas Paine's—is to do good, and to be religious we must be honest. I therefore honestly presume to advise you to never make that assertion in public again. It is detrimental to you as a Christian gentleman, and detrimental to the cause of Christ. You are a young preacher, I am an old one—not of theology—but for thirty-four years I have taught medicine and morals, and I assure you honesty is the best policy. Never let enthusiasm lead you from the path of truth; be mentally as well as physically temperate, and your conscience will be as clear as your title in heaven can be.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Speak No Ill.

Other people have their faults,
And so have you as well;
But all ye chance to see or hear
Ye have no right to tell.

If ye canna speak o' good,
Take care, and see and feel
Earth has all too much o' woe,
And not enough o' weal.

Be careful that ye make nae strife,
Wi' meddling tongue and brain;
For ye will find enough to do
If ye but look at hame.

If ye canna speak o' good,
Oh! dinna speak at all;
For there is grief and woe enough
On this terrestrial ball.

If ye should feel like picking flaws,
Ye better go, I ween,
And read the book that tells ye all
About the mote and beam.

Dinna lend a ready ear
To gossip or to strife,
Or perhaps 'twill make for ye
Nae sunny things of life.

Oh! dinna add to others' woe,
Nor mock it with your mirth;
But giv' ye kindly sympathy
To suffering ones of earth.

Auntie Bright's Lectures.

III.—THE STORY OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

"The French Revolution," said Madge, gravely, "was the reaction of tyranny."

"And like many another reaction, worse than its cause," ventured Walter.

Auntie Bright was listening. Madge's pleasant voice went on: "It was the rule of ignorance, and ignorance is always the worse, albeit its opponents are craft and duplicity."

Auntie Bright never concealed her pride in Madge and Walter, even in their presence. She audibly applauded. "Madge, you have been reading Carlyle," she said.

"Even so," replied her niece. "Have you not been reading Proudhon, a greater cynic than Carlyle?"

"I like Proudhon," cried Walter, "he analyzes so clearly, and expounds such grave philosophical deductions with the utmost simplicity. And he is so plain that I believe the veriest child could comprehend him."

"If, as he says, your mind is capable of uniting two propositions, and deducing a third therefrom."

"The logical mind," said Walter, lightly. "Well, we, at least, ought to be capable of that after auntie's lectures upon logic."

"My lectures," said auntie, smiling at the expression. "Well, they have been brief enough, and profusely illustrated."

"All the better," rejoined her nephew. "We're such children still that we need something of that sort to help us understand."

"I am so grateful that I should like another one," said Madge, slyly.

Auntie Bright could not be proof against such persuasiv flattery. "But," she said, "you are as well informed as I."

"No, indeed," cried two dissenting voices, while Madge said, coaxingly, "Tell us a story of the French Revolution."

Auntie Bright's stock of stories was great. Now she sighed and said: Well, a historical story will tell you more of the French Revolution than I could tell you in sober fact. And to get an idea of the stormy times at that period, I will tell you

THE STORY OF THE DAUPHIN.

He was born at Versailles in 1785. He was a most affectionate child, and was ardently attached to his mother. He used to sport about the garden of the palace. Little Trianon was his favorite playground.

He would arise early in the morning to gather flowers from the garden to lay on his mother's pillow.

"Ah," he would say, when weary of play, "I have not earned the first kiss from mother to-day."

The Revolution came and cast a shadow over Versailles, with all its glory. The royal family were surrounded by enemies, and were in constant terror, and the little dauphin was made unhappy by the sight of his mother's tears.

One day a serving-woman told him that if he would procure some favor for her she would be as happy as a queen.

"As happy as a queen," he repeated sadly. "I know of one queen who does nothing but weep."

The revolutionists overthrew the Bastille and throne, and the members of the royal family were obliged to seek protection in the National Assembly. They were then confined in an old French prison called the Temple.

The king was tried by the Assembly, condemned, and executed. He deeply loved the dauphin and parted from him in great sorrow.

After the king's death, the dauphin was the principal solace of the queen in her imprisonment. He was at last removed from the queen's apartment by an order of the committee of public safety. It was related that when the guard came to take him away, his mother fought for him until her strength was exhausted, and she fell senseless to the floor.

After the execution of his mother he was given over to the care of a brutal shoemaker, named Simon, who endeavored to cause his death without committing palpable murder. He was ill-fed, beaten, and abused, and received the name of the "She-wolf's-whelp," referring to Marie Antoinette.

At this period the police were in the habit of distributing in the streets songs against "Madam Veto," as the queen had been called. One of the most infamous of these, vulgar as it was brutal, had been procured by Simon.

One day, for the want of a new torture for the child, Simon resolved to make him sing this obscene song against his mother. "Come along, Capet," said he. "Here is a new song which you must sing to me."

He handed the song to the dauphin. The boy saw its meaning, and with all the instincts of a susceptible nature, he recoiled from the thought of reviling his mother. He laid it down on the table without a word.

Simon arose in wrath.

"I thought I said you must sing."

"I never will sing such a song."

"I declare to you that I will kill you if you refuse to obey me."

"Never!"

Simon caught up the andiron and threw it at the child with a force that would have proved fatal had he not missed his aim. His passion then gradually subsided, but the boy refused to sing.

One day, after a series of abuses too shocking to relate, Simon seized the dauphin by the ear, and, drawing him to the middle of the apartment, said:

"Capet, if the Vendéans were to set you at liberty, what would you do to me?"

"I would forgive you," replied the unfortunate boy.

His situation at last became wretched in the extreme. He was placed in a filthy cell, where he could neither receive pure air nor have exercise; his food was scanty, his bed was not made for six months, and his clothes were not changed for a year. He became covered with vermin, and mice used to nibble at his feet. He passed the days in utter silence, wishing only to die. His sensibilities became mercifully deadened, so that he lived in a self-made realm of pure fantasy.

After the overthrow of the revolutionary government under Robespierre, he was assigned to more merciful keepers. But his body and mind were in ruins, and all efforts to restore him were in vain.

It was a lovely June day in the summer of 1795. He was dying. Without the air was full of sunshine, of birds and roses.

"Are you in pain?" asked an attendant.

"Yes," he said, "but not in so much as I was; the music is so sweet."

He presently added: "Do you not hear the music?"

"From whence does it come?"

"From above."

His eyes became luminous; he seemed happy and peaceful, and he fancied that among the voices that seemed to be singing around him he could distinguish that of his mother. It was pure fancy, but it grew out of the filial devotion of his heart.

The pitiful story saddened the young people very much. Auntie Bright's own sympathetic voice lent additional pathos to the romance. At last Madge said:

"Do you suppose any of the revolutionists suffered as that boy did?"

Auntie Bright gave a quick sigh.

"There is no doubt of it, Madge; but for that part of the story I refer you to Harriet Martineau."

Auntie Bright arose, signifying that the audience was at an end. IDA BALLOU.

Thomas Paine Remembered in Ohio.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am in this city (Columbus, Ohio) teaching elocution and oratory. One of my classes proposed that we have a picnic on Decoration Day, and we are having it.

Knowing that I would be expected to help make the time pass pleasantly, I brought with me the Thomas Paine number of THE TRUTH SEEKER and the pamphlet, "Federation and Union." We looked at the picture of Paine's home, his monument, and himself, read some from the paper, talking of Paine and his great work for the freedom of his country and for the right of Free thought. Miss Nora Beard proposed, "Three cheers for Thomas Paine," and they were as heartily given as though we had numbered hundreds.

Then, from "Federation and Union," I read S. P. Putnam's speech, "Our Flag." The response was "Three cheers for Putnam and Our Flag." We then had a patriotic recitation by Alma Coulter, the youngest member of the class, a sweet little girl of nine years. In response to the request for a dramatic reading, I gave a cutting from your story, "Jack Howard's Step-mother."

Some of those present had heard very little of Thomas Paine, but all were broad-minded, and received his ideas and other Liberal thought more enthusiastically than I had dared anticipate.

Before the literary part of our program we had a good dinner under the spreading branches, and now the cloth is laid for another meal. The class wanted a stroll in the woods and I wanted quiet, so while they were gone the thought came, "Write to the Corner," and I proceeded to do so.

We could not participate in the exercises at the grave of Thomas Paine, but our little celebration has been very enthusiastic and inspiring. The book and paper I carried were borrowed for further reading, and I trust the interest awakened may continue.

The strollers have returned. They approve of the above, and say: "Add that we have had a good boat ride on the lake."

We must eat our lunch and go back to the city, where I am to read to-night. Sincerely yours, M. FLORENCE JOHNSON.

Correspondence.

SALEM, NEB., May 29, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my second letter to the Children's Corner. My school was out last week, and we had ten graduates. About two months ago the people of Salem held a large meeting for about five weeks. The preacher got about two hundred converts, the most of them being children from seven to seventeen years, and a few rough boys, and some that got their breakfast on their way home from church. I went one night, and it was like going to a show to see them.

Your Liberal friend,

NELLIE BRINEGAR.

CHICAGO, ILL., June 15, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My father is dead, and I am just eight years old, and I wish to write a letter. I am sorry my father is dead. I am going to try to be good to my mother. I would like to have some song books. Could you please tell me where we could get the song books? I go to Clarke's school, and my teacher's name is Miss

A Chance for Women to Make Money.

I saw one of your subscribers tell in your column a few weeks ago how she made money selling Dish Washers. I wrote to the Iron City Dish Washer Co., 145 S. Highland Ave., Station A, Pittsburg, Pa., and obtained one of their Dish Washers and tried it myself first. It is just lovely; you can wash and dry the dishes for a family in two minutes, without touching your hands to a dish or putting them in hot water. I made the first day $5, and everybody wanted a Dish Washer just as soon as they saw me wash their dishes. Since then I have made as high as $18 a day, and I believe that I can get enough money to keep my brother at school next winter and have money in the bank too. Any lady or gentleman can do as well as I am doing, I am sure, as I had no experience. When everybody wants to buy, it is not hard to sell. Anyone can get information by writing the above firm, and I am glad to add my experience, because I think it is my duty to others to help them over the hard times.

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE
By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dip into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

THE BRAIN AND BIBLE;

OR

THE CONFLICT BETWEEN MENTAL SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.

By EDGAR C. BEALL, M.D.,

with a preface by

R. G. INGERSOLL.

This is the only work of its kind in the literature of Freethought. Its arguments are based upon scientific phrenology, and appeal directly to the reader's sense of logic and love of justice. It is eloquent as well as convincing.

Price, cloth, $1. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to wealth of the leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of special interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies. $1.00

Fifty copies. 4.50

One hundred copies. 8.00

400 Years OF Freethought

By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pp., Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. $5.

With The Truth Seeker for One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES.

A new edition of that splendid prose poem "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt boveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

Not for Parsons.

REV. DR. BARRELL: "I can't get the introduction to this sermon worded just to suit me." Mrs. Barrell: "Why don't you start it with: 'As has been said before, and so well said?'"

DORCAS: "I never knew any good come of keeping Lent." Mrs. Dorcas: "Why, my dear, look at Mrs. Hillaire. She was cleaning a fish the other day and found a diamond ring in its inside."—Judge.

"We have come to offer you an increase of salary," said the deacon, "but we have doubts whether you will accept it." "Why so?" asked the parson, eagerly. "Because," said the deacon, "we haven't been able to collect it."

DURING the past two weeks twenty-one persons have been baptized at Prineville in the cold waters of Ochoco creek, and others are waiting for warmer water, taking their chances meanwhile with other sinners.—Portland Oregonian.

MINISTER: "Have you spoken a kind word to some poor brother on this glad Sabbath day, Brother Solum?" Brother Solum: "Yes, sir." Minister: "Ah, what effect did it have?" Brother Solum: "Wonderful. He said I was a blank hypocrite, and it was no use to lecture him on Sunday."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

FIRST BEGGAR: "Where did you get that fine overcoat?" Second do.: "At the big house at the corner." First do.: "Why, I went there only this mornin' shiverin' with cold, and dey wouldn't gimme a rag." Second: "Oh, ah! but I didn't ask for clothes for myself. I told 'em it was fur the pore heathen in darkest Africa."

THE minister was expected to make a visit. The mother called her young hopeful and told him, if the minister asked his name, he was to reply, Jack; his age, he was to say, 5 years old; where bad children went to, he was to answer, to hell. The good man arrived and asked his age, and wishing to show his mother how well he had remembered his lesson, he replied, "Jack, five years old, go to hell."

THE pastor of a Congregational church of Somerville, Mass., distributes a neatly printed sheet containing the church notices, in the pews, in lieu of reading them. This was one of the recent notices: "It may not be inappropriate to call attention of the audience to the bad habit they have fallen into of watching people who come in late, especially those who have new clothes. These late comers are modest people, and it must be a serious annoyance to have their raiment a subject of remark. They wear it unconsciously, and prefer that you would not notice them. The Sunday services are at 10:30, and 7:30, for the benefit of all who desire to spend an hour in worship; but for all those who have recently visited the tailor, and milliner, and dressmaker, the morning service begins anywhere from 10:30 to 11, and the evening service ten minutes before 8. For the benefit of the very tardy ones the announcement is hereby made that the benediction will be the only portion of the service in which they are respectfully invited to participate."—New York Tribune.

MISS MOLLY ELLIOT SEAWELL relates the following anecdote in the course of a sketch of John Paul Jones, in the Century for April: The landing on St. Mary's isle thoroughly alarmed the coasts, and the name and character were well known. The Ranger being seen beating up the Solway toward the "land town o' Kirkcaldy," the frightened people assembled on the shore, and presently down came their "meenister," Rev. Mr. Shirra, lunging a huge armchair, which he flung down on the shore, and then plumped himself violently into it. He was short of breath, and very angry with the deity for permitting such doings as Paul Jones's; and, puffing and blowing, he made the following prayer, which tradition has preserved: "Now, Lord, dinna ye think it is a shame for ye to send this vile pirate to rob our folk o' Kirkcaldy? For ye ken they are puir enough already, and hae naething to spare. They are all fairly guid, and it wad be a pity to serve them in sic a wa'. The wa' the wind blows, he'll be here in a jiffy, and wha kens what he may do? He is nane too guid for anything. Muckle's the mischief he has done already. Ony pocket gear they hae gathered thegither, he will gang wi' the whole o't, and maybe burn their houses, tak' their claes, and strip them to their sarks! And wae's me! Wha kens but the bluidy villain may tak' their lives. The puir women are maist frightened out o' their wits, and the bairns skeeking after them. I canna tho't it! I canna tho't it! I hae been long a faithfu' servant to ye, Lord; but gin ye dinna turn the wind about, and blow the scoundrel out o' our gate, I'll nae stir a foot, but just sit here until the tide comes in and drowns me. Sae tak' your wull o't, Lord!" The prayer appears to have been effective; for at that very moment the wind changed, and blew "the scoundrel out o' our gate."

THE GIANT DELUSION. A paper read before the Freethought International Congress at Chicago. One of Otto Wettstein's fraternal attacks on Spiritualism.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY. To which is added a poem on Thomas Paine. One of Samuel P. Putnam's most brilliant lectures. Every Christian who asks the idiotic question, "What Has Infidelity Done?" should be induced to read this book, if he has to be paid to do it.

HOW CAN WE BE SAVED? Was Jesus Supernaturally Conceived, and did he Rise from the Dead? Israel W. Groh.

INGERSOLL AND JESUS. Showing how the two agree. A poem by Samuel P. Putnam.

THE LIMITATIONS OF TOLERATION. A discussion between Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic R. Condit, Ex-Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, before the Nineteenth Century Club of New York. "Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him." Colonel Ingersoll maintains this, the others deny it. Mr. Condit is a Roman Catholic, Mr. Woodford a Protestant.

MATERIALISM: Its History, and Its Influence Upon Society. Dr. Louis Buchner.

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE WORKERS. A Consideration of the Marvels and Miracles of the New Testament. One of John Peck's best books.

MOSES BEFORE THE COURT, or The Forgery of the Old Testament. Dedicated to the Clergy. H. J. Seignuret, M.D.

THE NEW GOD. "It is an open secret that man has always made his Gods. They exist in and through him, as the image exists in and through the mirror. Take away man and you take away God—the image vanishes." This pamphlet, therefore, is a consideration of what kind of a God man should make. Samuel P. Putnam.

ORTHODOXY. A lecture by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and one of that great man's best. The subjects considered are: Orthodox Religion Dying Out, Religious Deaths and Births, the Religion of Reciprocity, Mohammed, The Destruction of Art, The Discovery of America, Copernicus and Kepler, Charles Darwin, Special Providence, The Latest Creed, God as a Governor, The Love of God, The Fall of Man, The Atonement, The Second Birth, Inspiration, The Reign of Truth and Love, The Wars It Brought, The Resurrection, The Judgment-Day, Pious Evasions, "No Bible, No Civilization," Miracles of the New Testament, The Ascension, Casting out Devils, Necessity of Belief, Eternal Punishment, Some who Are Damned, What I Believe, Immortality. This lecture is on the famous text, "The Clergy know that I know that they do not know."

PERSONAL EXISTENCE AFTER DEATH IMPROBABLE. L. R. Smith.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS MASS MEETING AT LINCOLN HALL, WASHINGTON. Being the Speeches of Hon. FREDERICK DOUGLASS and Col. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL on the Decision of the United States Court that the Civil Rights Act is Unconstitutional. Fifty-three large octavo pages, of which Colonel Ingersoll's speech occupies 33 pages.

PULPIT, PEW, AND CRADLE. So long as the Pulpit speaks to believing Pews composed chiefly of mothers, the cradle will be rocked by ghosts and the race will remain on its knees to a devil of its own creation and to a God who is powerless against him. One of Helen Gardener's brightest efforts.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY BETTER THAN ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. M. Babcock.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS. One of L. K. Washburn's best lectures, and it is, like all of his, very good.

THE ROARING LION ON THE TRACK. One of M. Babcock's comical sermons.

SCIENCE vs. RELIGION, or The Conflict Between Reason and Superstition. T. O. Widdicombe.

ST. MATTHEW BEFORE THE COURT. Presenting the evidence of the forgery of his alleged gospel. H. J. Seignuret.

SISTER LUCY AND HER AWFUL DISCLOSURES REGARDING NEW HALL CONVENT. Showing that Convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom.

SPIRITUALISM FROM A MATERIALISTIC STANDPOINT. B. F. Underwood. Written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK. Torture Implements Employed in the 15th and 16th centuries for the promulgation of Christianity. Being the Nuremberg Collection, with specimens from the Holy Inquisition. 28 pictures. The descriptions and reflections by George E. Macdonald.

VICTOR HUGO'S ORATION ON VOLTAIRE, delivered on the one hundredth anniversary of Voltaire's death. Translated by James Parton, author of the Life of Voltaire. To which are added the three great poems of Goethe, George Eliot, and Longfellow.

WAS CHRIST CRUCIFIED? Austin Bierbower. A lawyer's consideration of the evidence of that alleged event.

WAS JESUS INSANE? A consideration of Christ's alleged acts which would lead one to that conclusion. L. K. Washburn.

WHY DON'T HE LEND A HAND? And other Agnostic Poems. Samuel P. Putnam. The title poem is perhaps the most popular of Mr. Putnam's many poems, and a great many editions of it have been called for. The other poems are: The Golden Age, The Ideal and the Real, Not Dead, but Living, Fruition, Hope, Thomas Paine, Nature's Gospel, Address to Deity, and the short poem so often recited with great effect by Charles Watts, Give Us Light.

WILL THE COMING MAN WORSHIP GOD? B. F. Underwood; written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

WOMAN: FOUR CENTURIES OF PROGRESS. A lecture delivered at the Freethinkers' International Congress at Chicago. Considering: The Cause of Woman's Subjugation, The Canon Law and Its Effects Upon Her, Theology Never Helpful to Woman, Invention Woman's Friend, Freethought the Benefactor of Woman. Susan H. Wixon.

Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

EVERY one is born with a nose and five fingers, and no one is born with a knowledge of God. This may be deplorable or not, but it is certainly the human condition.—Voltaire.

RELIGION is not in the purview of human government. Religion is essentially distinct from the government and exempt from its cognizance. A connection between them is injurious to both.—James Madison.

REFORMS that reform make progress slowly. Violent action does not properly belong to any movement looking toward the development of ideas and the application of principles to human life. Because every advance made must be clearly the finished outcome and expression of public need and public opinion in harmony with natural law.—Louise Tresscotte.

TOLSTOI wrote "Ivan the Fool" in a mood of essential trust. When freedom is popular even the autocrat will turn professor. I do not fear my neighbor when he knows I trust him. He fears me when he knows that I feel unsafe next him unless I bolt my doors. Restriction reaps anger, suffers retaliation, trips over its own buffers. It violates and is violated. It poisons the root of the tree from which it eats the fatal fruit.—Horace L. Traubel.

DURING the period when the church ruled supreme, in intellectual and material culture and development men fell very low, far below the level of the days of classic antiquity. This is easily explained; for when men take upon themselves to prepare only for a future life, then the present ceases to carry any value. Well might the Christian father, Tertullian, exclaim: "Desire for knowledge other than of Jesus Christ, learning other than the gospel, is no longer necessary." For all that man need know was to be found in the Bible, and what was not to be read therein was untrue and mischievous. Very truly has Ludwig Feuerbach said: "If we are for heaven born, then are we lost to earth."—Ludwig Buchner.

THE temporary nature of Christianity is plainly indicated by its indorsement of the Old Testament. Jesus was never able entirely to outgrow the prejudices of his Jewish education. "One jot or one tittle," says he, "shall in no wise pass from the law till all is fulfilled." "The scribes and pharisees sit in Moses' seat; all, therefore, whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do." As if the doctrine of these Jewish law-expositors were all divine! Jesus refers to the old stories of the Jewish Bible as if he believed them, and he evidently did, and even takes the marvelous tale of Jonah for true, and refers to prophecies of himself in the Old Testament which certainly have no existence.—William Denton.

THE supernatural and the miraculous controled the world. Everything was explained, but nothing was understood. The church was at the head. The sick bought from monks little amulets of consecrated paper. They did not send for a doctor, but for a priest, and the priest sold the diseased and the dying these magical amulets. These little pieces of paper, with the help of some saint, would cure diseases of every kind. If you

If you would keep one in the house, evil spirits would not enter your doors, and if you buried them in the fields, you would have good weather, the frost would be delayed, rain would come when needed, and abundant crops would bless your labor. The church insisted that all diseases could be cured in the name of God, and that these cures could be effected by prayers, exorcism, by touching bones of saints, pieces of the true cross; by being sprinkled with holy water or with sanctified salt, or touched with magical oil.—Ingersoll.

AT ABOUT ONE-HALF VALUE.

A small farm of 10 acres 86 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water, good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes walk of the railroad station, 9 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes walk.

The place is specially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1.00 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

THE PLACE CAN BE BOUGHT FOR $3,500

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings, that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

THE ELIXIR OF LIFE

is not in magic potions, "specifics" or electric clasp, but only in Wisdom—THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH. Wise men study nature, shun disease learn to maintain vigor and regain it by reading the most complete book of Medical, Social, Sexual Science, by an eminent physician of 35 years experience. The "old, original, standard" work, endorsed by all, imitated by many, equalled by none. Inspired by wish to aid humanity, it has providentially saved thousands. Its essays on marriage, parentage, adaptation, marital failures, etc., are of inestimable value to all now married or who ever expect to be. The last edition has 1,000 pages, 3 colored charts of vitals, 300 wood cuts, 21 chromos, showing origin of life—development of man. APPENDIX has over 200 Recipes. This has been my standing offer during forty years past, a pledge made in over half a million copies of my "Medical Common Sense and Plain Home Talk"—I stand by it. Anyone afflicted with any chronic, obstinate or obscure disease, defect or deformity, or troubled about some private affair in which the help of a physician of broad and long experience is desired, is welcome to state the case to me, in person or by letter, (sending return postage) and I will advise frankly, fully and confidentially, and send, if wanted, my "Foot-Prints on The Path to Health," Dr. E. B. FOOTE, 122 Lex. Av., New York.

These afflicted with Early Decay, Loss of Manhood, Wasting Discharges, Varicocele, Mental and Physical Debility and who are desirous of being cured, a booklet will be sent to their address for ten cents, sealed in a plain envelope, giving causes and symptoms of the complaints, and a description of the Doctor's important medical discovery—an Outstanding Application—a positive cure—the only remedy of the kind in existence—with evidences of success. Address, DR. R. P. FELLOWS, wherever you saw this adver. Vineland, N. J.

THE Prince of Wales is reported to have got himself into disfavor with his pious and punctilious mother. He visited the Whitsuntide exhibition of paintings at the Guildhall, and afterward dined with a city sheriff. Victoria told him that he should have observed Whitsuntide by receiving the sacraments of the church, and that as a leading member of the church he should have avoided all public functions.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND has issued a proclamation warning Cubans and their sympathizers against fitting out filibustering expeditions in the United States, the same being in violation of the neutrality laws. As to the progress of the insurrection in Cuba, nothing definite is known here.

GOVERNOR GREENHALGE, of Massachusetts, vetoed many measures passed by the legislative majority of his party, among them a bill exempting old soldiers from civil service examinations. He held the measure to be class legislation. The legislature passed it over the veto, but many veterans commend the governor's action.

A LARGE convention in behalf of free silver was recently held in Memphis. The Populists were admitted, but against the protests of many of the Democratic leaders. On the other hand, the Populists of Iowa refused to endorse the plan of General Weaver for a union with the free silver Democrats of the state, and denounced and repudiated the general himself.

THERE has recently been a very notable race in France. The contest was successful in every way, the winning carriages making an average speed of nearly fifteen miles an hour.

SECRETARY OF WAR LAMONT has approved one of the plans for the bridge across the Hudson river at this city. The plan of the Union Bridge Company was the one approved, and it was accompanied by a guarantee that the bridge would be built for less than $25,000,000. It contemplates a clear opening between the pier-heads of 3,110 feet and a height of 150 feet in the clear above high water, and is to carry six tracks on a level.

THE Supreme Court of Illinois decides that the Distilling and Cattle Feeding Company, usually known as the Whisky Trust, is an illegal combination in restraint of trade. The court holds that corporations have such powers only as are distinctly stated in their charters—that what is not clearly given is by implication denied, that they can own no property that is not necessary to carry on the business specified in their charters. It is supposed that this decision will have a material effect upon the Pullman Car Company.

THE Board of Police Commissioners of New York city have resolved to rigorously and continuously enforce the Sunday excise law, although it is evident that the members are personally opposed to the law and enforce it only because it is on the statute books. The courts are already swamped with these excise cases. There are now between 6,000 and 7,000 such cases untried, while the grand jury recently threw out 3,000 cases, refusing to indict even on the arresting officer's evidence that there had been violation. The new law closing barber-shops on Sunday will make this Puritanic farce all the ghastlier.

EDITORIAL

From the Freethought Magazine.

"The advertisement of that well-known Freethinker and distinguished jeweler, Otto Wettstein, appears in our advertising pages. . . . Mr. Wettstein is worthy of the patronage of the public. He is an honest man that can be trusted. Whatever he agrees to give you you are sure to get, as we have learned by experience. Brother Wettstein is doing grand, good work for the cause of Freethought, and is entitled to the consideration of the Liberal public."

The subject of the above eulogy claims no credit as a writer or scholar; his efforts in that line are crude, and simply the "Musings" of his few idle hours. But he does claim to be a first-class jeweler. Has worked at the bench for forty-five years; is a natural mechanic, art critic, acute judge of goods, close buyer, and does business on minimum degree of expense. His FREE-THOUGHT BADGE is conceded to be the most artistic and expressive emblem ever designed. His "OTTO WETTSTEIN" WATCH combines all the qualities of a first-class timekeeper at one-half the usual rates, and his COLONEL INGERSOLL SOUVENIR SPOON is without question, the finest specimen of the die-cutter's art ever produced. It is his aim now to establish himself as YOUR JEWELER.

Science Versus Religion,

OR, THE Conflict Between Reason and Superstition.

By T. C. WIDDICOMBE,

Price, 10 Cents. For sale at this Office.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

BRIDGING THE GULF.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price two dollars).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

What a New Subscriber, Who Has Received His Pictorial Text-Book, Says of It.

LAMAR, MO., May 8, 1895.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is received, and after a careful examination of the work I unhesitatingly pronounce it one of the most impressive Freethought works ever issued from the press. It will indeed "corner the parson" and all his flock, and I shall take great pleasure in showing the book to my orthodox friends. As a reference book it is invaluable, and it should find a place in every Freethinker's library.

Respectfully, W. F. BAILEY.

When Renewing Your Subscription, Take Advantage of These Good Offers

For $6.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and S. P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" ($5). Large Octavo, 1150 pages, gilt sides and back, marbled edges—the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press. 140 Half Tone Engravings of the Prominent Freethinkers of the past four centuries.

The object of this work is to present the Course of Freethought throughout the Civilized World from the time of Columbus and Bruno to the time of Ingersoll. It is a radical Historic Record of the greatest developments of the human race. It reveals Freethought as an intellectual, moral, literary, social, industrial, and political movement. It shows what Freethought is in itself, how manifold are its influences, and with what promise we can hail its future triumph. "FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT" embraces the most illustrious pages of human history, adorned with the brightest genius, radiant with the most splendid poetry, rich with the greatest inventions and discoveries, and ennobled with freedom's most shining advance. Nothing can be more interesting or more inspiring to the pioneer workers of to-day, to those who are still in the van for human rights and progress. No Liberal can afford to be without this book. It contains the greatest thoughts and the greatest deeds of the greatest men in one harmonious and magnificent whole, a vivid picture of man's sublimest evolution, with the added glory of woman's emancipation from the chains and slavery of a barbaric church.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Darwin and After Darwin

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

A Cabinet Officer's Ignorance and Superstition.

On June 12, Hilary A. Herbert, Secretary of the Navy, delivered an address to the students of the Agricultural and Mechanical College at Auburn, Ala. His speech was the "feature" of the commencement exercises. Here is one of the gems formed in the laboratory of his official brain, and which rolled from his oracular lips on this occasion:

"There are now, as there have been in the past, men who, like Robert G. Ingersoll, would tear forever from the heart of man all of Christian hope and leave him to contemplate in blank dismay the remediless inequality of human conditions, who would rob the grief-stricken widow and orphan of the consolations of religion. Tom Paine thought a hundred years ago that his 'Age of Reason' was to free mankind, as Ingersoll now claims he is doing, from what they call the cruel superstitions of Christianity; but Paine's 'Age of Reason' has taken its place upon the book shelf among the dusty volumes of forgotten literature, where Ingersoll's lectures will mold, while Christianity is conquering the world."

Did the gentleman deliver this sermon as a plain citizen of Alabama, or is it the ex cathedra utterance of the United States Secretary of the Navy? The answer to the question is to be found in the reply to another question: Did the college authorities invite the man Hilary A. Herbert to deliver the address, or was it the Secretary of the Navy whom they made the drawing card of the commencement exercises? Of course there is but one answer—it was the Secretary who was asked and advertised. We affirm that he, an official of the federal government speaking publicly, was forbidden by the spirit if not by the letter of the Constitution to take sides in a religious contention. As a member of the Cabinet, his duties are secular, not ecclesiastical, and while it is true that, in the strictest technical sense, he did not speak as the Secretary of the Navy, nevertheless it was the Secretary of the Navy who spoke, and it is the Secretary of the Navy who will be quoted by the religious orators, editors, and pamphleteers.

As for the assertions themselves, they show that Mr. Herbert is grossly superstitious, unable to reason clearly and logically, and uninformed in matters of current literature and polemics. When he talks of the "remediless inequality of human conditions," and deduces from that inequality the necessity of the belief in compensation in another world, he forgets that, according to the creed of the Christian, the God who has done so unequally for his children on this earth is the same God who is to be trusted to do so much better for them in another state of existence. Why should we think that he will? We generally prophesy a man's future from his past, and assuredly in all reason we cannot discard the rule in the case of God, for to do so is to say that the "unchangeable," who "altereth not," who "is the same, yesterday, to-day, and forever," is less consistent than weak, vacillating, circumstance-driven man. Has Mr. Herbert overlooked the further fact that, if orthodoxy be true, the only "consolation" that the vast majority of the human race will find, after life here is over, is the certainty that the "justice" of God is supplementing their miseries on earth with the eternal tortures of hell? How comforting such a belief as orthodox Christianity must be to the believing mother whose son has just died "unsaved" or whose companion is an Infidel!

It is clear that Mr. Herbert is wholly uninformed concerning the progress of thought in the age in which he lives; if he were not he would never have made the rash assertions he did regarding the "Age of Reason." We cannot do better than to quote here from the correction of his wild mistakes which George E. Macdonald sent to the World and which that journal printed:

"The secretary said that Paine's 'Age of Reason' had taken its place upon the book-shelf 'among the dusty volumes of forgotten literature.' That is distinctly untrue. The work is still standard, and to-day has a larger sale not only than any reply ever written to it but probably exceeding that of any distinctively religious work except the Bible. If Secretary Herbert were in touch with the literary world he would know that the Putnam's now have the writings of Thomas Paine, including the 'Age of Reason,' in press; that these writings, edited by Moncure D. Conway, are issuing in a four-volume edition, and that his 'Life,' by Mr. Conway, is one of the most important biographies of the last decade, as the testimony of the reviewers will prove. Had Mr. Herbert been totally ignorant of the subject upon which he spoke he could not have made a greater error than he did; had he designed to misrepresent the facts he could not have been more successful. Whatever the source or motive of his address so far as it had reference to the matter here discussed, it must give well-informed persons an ill impression of the Secretary of the Navy, and I very much doubt if mistake or misrepresentation will be of any advantage to him as a defender of the faith. Our government officials should speak very respectfully of Paine, for he was one of the fathers of the republic, and as such was instrumental in providing them with places."

The fact about the "Age of Reason" is that its sale is constantly increasing and that more copies were sold last year than in any previous year. We are mailing eight for one dollar to as many different addresses. Some person having the proper missionary spirit should see to it that Secretary Herbert is not forgotten in the general distribution.

So Far, Kentucky's Judges Are Ahead.

The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER have not forgotten the very admirable decision of Judge Parker, of Lexington, in the Moore blasphemy case, in the summer of 1894. The opinion was well-reasoned, clear, and to the point. We reproduce one paragraph:

"Blasphemy is a crime grown from the same parent stem as apostasy and heresy. It is one of a class of offenses designed for the same general purpose, the fostering and protection of a religion accepted by the state as the true religion, whose precepts and tenets it was thought all good subjects should observe. In the code of laws of a country enjoying absolute religious freedom there is no place for the common-law crime of blasphemy. Unsuitable to the spirit of the age, its enforcement would be in contravention of the constitution of this state, and this crime must be considered a stranger to the laws of Kentucky."

A few days ago, two judges of Louisville heard together some cases growing out of the attempt to enforce the Sunday laws of Kentucky. Both held the law to be unconstitutional, although their reasoning followed different lines and their opinions were filed separately. The American Sentinel says:

"The case at bar arose under section 1,303 of the code of the state, which prohibits Sunday liquor-selling, under penalty of a fine of from $10 to $50 for each offense, but, by agreement, the case was so briefed as to include also section 1,321, which forbids secular labor or business on Sunday, 'except ordinary household offices or other works of necessity or charity, and work required in the maintenance or operation of a ferry, skiff, or steamboat, or steam or street railway,' or by 'persons who are members of a religious society who observe as a Sabbath any other day of the week but Sunday.' The penalty for a violation of this section is a fine of from $2 to $50 for each offense."

Judge William L. Jackson, of the circuit court, declared that the statute was unconstitutional in that it was violative of section 59 of the constitution of 1890, which provides that "in all cases where a general law can be made applicable no special law shall be passed." Reasoning from this, Judge Jackson concludes that any statute which forbids a particular business on Sunday, or imposes a heavier penalty for selling one commodity than for selling others, is unconstitutional and of no effect, but he thinks that a general Sunday law would be constitutional. We must beg leave to differ. A law applicable to but one day of the week is clearly a special law, and must inevitably be a discrimination in favor of certain individuals and against others. There is no necessity for laws making that a crime or misdemeanor on Sunday which is not equally a crime or misdemeanor on the other days of the week. Neither is there any justice in them.

Judge Charles G. Richie of the county court held that the exceptions under Section 1321, and in particular that exempting "members of a religious society who observe as a Sabbath any other day in the week," brand the law as religious, and therefore in violation of Section 5 of the Bill of Rights, which says "that no human authority ought in any case whatever to control or interfere with the rights of conscience; and that no preference shall ever be given by law to any religious societies or modes of worship." That is getting down to bed rock, but is Judge Richie entirely consistent when he gives the opinion that a general Sunday law without exemptions would be constitutional? How could a law which sets apart a day held to be sacred by a portion of the people, and punishes as criminals others who do not believe it to be sacred, be constitutional? Certainly it would not be just. However, the decisions of Judges Richie and Jackson help somewhat to clear the legal atmosphere and to hasten the day when Kentucky must either give up all Sabbath statutes or adopt a law without exceptions. In the latter event, popular discontent will be widened and intensified, and, we hope, made effective for the extirpation of all such iniquitous legislation.

Turn we now to Minnesota. Our readers have been informed of the attempt of the Sabbatarians to prevent the Sunday playing of base-ball in St. Paul. The amusement has been enjoined. That tells the story. The injunction was granted on the "rest" pretext. Why, you say, base-ball playing is recreation, not work, as we define recreation and work; how could the court hold that the need of rest should operate to prevent the indulgence in amusement on Sunday? Easy enough, we assure you. If so many people were not fooled by the "rest" pretense there would be no danger in the vociferations and plottings of the Sundayites; that bubble must be persistently pricked, just as THE TRUTH SEEKER is constantly pricking it, or else the most oppressiv of Sabbath laws will be fastened on every state in the Union, and enforced. Sunday laws of all kinds must go; there can be neither liberty nor safety while any remain. The St. Paul correspondent of the American Sentinel relates the particulars of the fight which has ended in the defeat of the citizen by the priest. This was the position of the defenders of ball playing:

"The case was argued, the defense giving evidence, as set forth in the complaint itself, that the playing of the game only upon Sunday was sought to be enjoined, while such games were played upon other days of the week, therefore it was argued as being an effort to prevent Sabbath-breaking, a matter of which the court had no equitable cognizance; and that if a nuisance at all is being committed it is as much so on one day as another, and that the relief demanded evidenced the fact that these acts did not constitute a nuisance per se."

That is sound and unanswerable reasoning; the defense is perfectly valid. The answer of the prosecution was that the gatherings on Sunday were more objectionable than those on week days, and also that all such assemblages are less disturbing on the days when all members of the household are engaged in their regular secular vocations. The court reviewed these points, but said that he was not disposed to rest his decision on such "narrow grounds." And what were the supposedly broad grounds upon which he did rest it? He says:

"From the earliest time in this country, one day in the week for rest and tranquility has been everywhere recognized as an absolute right of the citizen who may desire to avail himself of such immunity from toil and business cares, and this right has been again and again recognized, established, and confirmed by express statute, by the setting aside of the seventh day for such purpose, invalidating all contracts attempted to be made thereon and inhibiting all manner of work save only that of charity and necessity. The citizen may spend the day as he will, provided he does not disturb his neighbor, and courts of equity will not interfere, but his right to a quiet and restful day must not be invaded."

Would the judge enjoin the ringing of church bells on the same ground that he enjoined the playing of base-ball? And yet will not the bells "disturb" more people by far than the ball playing will? Mind you, the injunction is not granted on the ground that the ball-game is a nuisance, for a nuisance is the same all days of the week, and the plaintiffs did not seek to stop it on other days than Sunday, which shows that the crusade was a wholly religious one. Perhaps one-tenth of the people of St. Paul attend church services on Sunday, and that a part of these may have their way all the other residents of the city may be incommoded. Of the ten per cent who do go to church, is it reasonable to suppose that more than one in two hundred would be, while at church or at home, within sound of the ball grounds? How could the 199 be "disturbed," in the proper meaning of the word, by the ball playing? What the judge means is that the church zealots would be disturbed in their minds by the thought that other people were enjoying themselves on Sunday in ways not approved by said zealots. That is all there is in the judge's painfully labored argument. Here is a little more of the learned opinion:

"Meetings of the character complained of, and continued for months to come, must necessarily, for the time being, disturb the peace and quietude of the home, and must, to use the statutory definition of nuisance, constitute 'an obstruction to the free use of property so as to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of life and property.'"

This argument, honestly and impartially applied on all days alike, would stop all noisy outdoor games, and the running of trains as well, and put mufflers on the wheels of carts and trucks. But the argument lacks the element of sincerity, so far as it is concurred in by the active promoters of Sunday legislation, for they are just as eager to shut the doors of theaters and opera-houses on Sunday as they are to stop ball-playing, although we all know that no one can be actually "disturbed" by the entertainments and music in the theaters and opera-houses. The fear of rivals is the real cause of the crusade of church people against Sunday amusements and their contributory work. Mr. Phelps, the correspondent of the Sentinel, referring to the last-quoted plea of the judge, says: "All of this was contradicted as a matter of fact by property-owners upon all sides, who would crowd windows and balconies every day, Sundays and all (unless with some few possible exceptions), in order that they might watch the progress of the games." Who that knows the modern man and woman can doubt the truth of this statement? Take down your legal barriers, put up at the instigation of priests, and let the people enjoy themselves, serene in the consciousness that liberty will do all that can be done to civilize mankind.

Plans and Work of the Enemy.

The National Reform Association (God-in-the-Constitution party) held its annual convention in Denver on June 3d and 4th. The mayor delivered the address of welcome. (Query for those Liberals who think there is "no danger": Would the mayor of Denver—or the mayor of any other city—deliver the address of welcome on behalf of the city to a convention of the Freethought Federation, organized to preserve the secular Constitution that the National Reformers are seeking to pervert or destroy?) The usual questions were discussed, but Dr. Wells introduced a new subject, arguing that the giving of sureties for public officials, contractors, and others, was forbidden by the Bible and was detrimental to morality, in that it weakened character and conveyed to the public the impression that a good surety was of more worth than a good character in the official for whom the surety was provided. There is much truth in the observation, but what are the people to do, with so many ardent Christians aspiring for public and responsible positions? The tax-payers and depositors must have some security, and especially now when the National Reform Association and its allies are teaching the young men and women that character is worthless in the face of temptation, that they must depend upon statute law to keep them sober and virtuous, to prevent them from becoming corrupted by reading bad books and gazing upon bad pictures, to insure their attending church on Sunday, and to keep them from wasting their money and blunting their moral faculties by patronizing games of hazard. We are not writing sarcastically nor with the intention of defaming our opponents. In all seriousness we say that the instruction now being imparted, by precept and example, to the youth of the country is demoralizing in the extreme. They are taught by all the agencies that the moralistic paternalists can command to give up reliance upon themselves, to look to the priest-guided state for truth, honesty, and moral rectitude, to stop developing character and begin packing caucusses and legislative committees.

Does some one think this an unjust judgment? In the report in the Christian Reformer in which we find the summary of Dr. Wells' address, it is stated that when he sat down "an important practical question was asked"; this question was "with reference to the method whereby the state is to determine the application of these or any other Bible texts in the sphere of public life." The italics are ours. There is to be no limit, you see, to the imposition of the majority's interpretation of the Bible upon the dissenting minority. Any doctrine may be enforced by law, even though it involves the stoning to death of the Sabbath-breaker, a la Leviticus. It is simply a question of legislative majorities; the Constitution, amended as contemplated by the theocrats, would no longer hold the ambitious and unscrupulous Christian party in check. Witness what follows:

"The inquiry was made whether or not the Supreme Court would need to be composed of theologians. In reply it was maintained that the whole difficulty in this matter is wholly imaginary. Such matters would not come in the first instance before the Supreme Court, but before the lawmaking body. [We shall discover presently what is the Supreme Court of the theocrats.] Any member of such a body who wishes to bring before it any measure relating to a question of morals, would introduce it in the form of a bill, just as is now done in all cases in all legislative bodies."

Said we not that the young are to be spared the necessity of developing a character? Their morals are to come to them ready made by a committee of politicians who are chiefly anxious to keep their fences in repair by voting for whatever they think the noisiest faction of their constituents want, just as the lawmakers of to-day swap votes with their fellow members to get through their pet measures so that they can go home at the end of the session and "point with pride" to their records! What a rich field for the legislative farmer would be the state that recognized the infinit number of moral problems as fit subjects for legislation, and particularly if they were to be referred to the Bible for final adjudication! Yes, that is it—the Bible is the theocrat's Supreme Court. Listen:

"If the Bible were recognized by the state as of supreme authority in political affairs, appeal could be made to it in settling any moral issue that might arise."

The passage seems to carry its own comment in letters of blinding intensity of illumination. And yet the Protestant ministers of Denver and vicinity welcome the National Reform Association and give it all the aid they can. During May Rev. H. H. George did much preparatory work in and about the capital of Colorado, and the Christian Reformer says that he found but one minister in all the places visited who was indifferent to the movement, and he was not acquainted with it!

The British Columbia Conference unanimously adopted the report of its resolutions committee:

"This document binds the conference and church to work as a unit toward securing legislation making it illegal to conduct excursions by rail or water on Sunday, to engage in hunting, fishing, or boating on that day; to engage in any game of ball or kindred sport, and to ride for the purpose of pleasure in any hack, sleigh, buggy, or other public vehicle, or to operate or patronize any Sunday street car."

At West Salem, Ill., on May 20th, J. F. Rothrock, a Seventh-Day Adventist, was arrested for keeping his store open on Sunday. As there is no state law against open stores he was prosecuted under a local ordinance and convicted. There can be no doubt that such ordinances are unconstitutional, as any one may see who will take the trouble to read Article II. of the Illinois Bill of Rights.

In Maryland, at Church Hill, a Seventh-Day Adventist, Robert R. Whaley, is serving a thirty days' sentence in jail for working in his garden on Sunday. How that reverberant employment must have "disturbed the peace and quiet" of his Methodist neighbors! Mr. Whaley is a carpenter, and for some time has been losing two days each week from his work, as he was building a house in the country and did not return until Friday night. Of course, as a conscientious believer in the Bible Sabbath, he kept that, and quietly worked in his garden on the first day of the week. He was formerly a Methodist, and it is to be presumed that the penalty he has now to pay may be regarded as his punishment for heresy. He is a poor man and has a wife and seven small children. This is his second term for "Sabbath breaking." Regarding such crimes as this, and general Sabbath laws, Die Rundschau, a German Lutheran paper of Chicago, tersely and truly says, "The most precious liberty of our country is at stake."

Some one said to us recently that no church, as a church, had indorsed the Sabbatarian and kindred crusades. We answered that the Reformed Presbyterian church (Covenanters) unqualifiedly indorsed every movement of this kind. Now comes the Presbyterian church of the United States of America (the main body of the Presbyterians, owning in 1890 untaxed church property to the amount of $74,455,200), at its recent assembly in Pittsburg, and adopts this resolution: "We heartily commend all Sunday legislation designed to protect the Christian Sabbath as a day of rest and worship." It is unquestionably true that all the Protestant denominations, with the exception of the Seventh Day Adventists and Baptists, and the Unitarians, occupy the same position, and the authority of the Roman hierarchy will soon be found supporting such legislation. In fact, as already noted, the Pope indorses the movement in France, and in this country many of the foremost men in that church are actively at work for Sunday laws.

In Manitoba, Robert Watt, an Adventist, was arrested for hauling rails on Sunday.

The Law Enforcement Society of this city is hot on the trail of violators of Sunday laws. It tells the officials that it is as much a crime to conceal a crime as it is to commit it. But who, except a bigot or an ignoramus, would say that shaving a man on Sunday is a crime? By the way, is it not worth thinking about that all these "Law and Order Leagues," "Law Enforcement Societies," and the rest of the unclean brood, are formed for the purpose of compelling observance of statutes and ordinances that are adapted only to children in the nursery, none of them to secure obedience to laws that take cognizance of real invasions of the individual?

In New Orleans the Sunday law is being as rigidly enforced as it can be, with all but one or two of the recorders (justices) of the city opposed to its execution.

The law provides that only mule and steam cars can be operated. Since it was adopted, the superstition-killing trolley has come in, and now the opponents of the law will try to make it operative against the electric cars, hoping to render the statute nugatory in this way. A large fund has been raised to fight the case in the courts. Recorder Willitt, who has paroled all violators of the law brought before him, writes to the superintendent of police, suggesting that he try conclusions with the electric companies. The sixteenth century survivals would have a hard row to hoe if a considerable number of justices and judges should develop the good sense and independence manifested by Recorder Willitt.

One Decision Reached.

In the Topeka Capital of the 18th inst. we find this paragraph:

"Judge Foster, of the United States District Court, yesterday overruled a motion to quash the indictment against J. B. Wise, a Clay county Freethinker, who, during a controversy with H. B. Vennum, of Industry, quoted a verse from the Bible on a postal card and sent it to Vennum. The latter was angry, and had Wise arrested on the charge of sending obscene matter through the mails. Adolph Bierck, attorney for the defendant, asked that the indictment be quashed, on the ground that if a part of the Bible is obscene the entire book is, and cannot, therefore, be sent through the mails. The motion was submitted by briefs."

Up to date the United States District Attorney has not notified the attorney here as to the disposition of the case, but assuming that the Capital's information is correct, the case will now go to the United States Circuit Court of Appeal, which sits in St. Louis next October. Judge Foster will not be a part of that court.

The appeal will be a costly affair, and we hope Mr. Wise's friends will come to his aid with substantial assistance. It will be worth a great deal to get a decision of a court of authority whether the Christians' "sacred" book is an obscene volume or not. Down in Peru lately the customs officials held a lot of "Protestant" Bibles, because they considered it a book of "immoral tendency," the customs officials being Roman Catholics. The courts finally overruled them, but that whole matter was a sectarian fight. Mr. Wise's case, however, is on its merits, with no sectarianism in it. If the Court of Appeal shall sustain Judge Foster, then, according to the decisions in the Bennett and other cases, the "Holy Bible" is an unmailable book. That will be a fine fix for the Christians to be in.

In Cincinnati the Germans are making a concerted attempt to liberalize the Sunday laws of that city. They ask that the people be permitted to have the afternoon of the day in common with the priests, while the latter are given a monopoly of the forenoon. The request is a very moderate one, but nevertheless it has sufficed to drive the Sabbatharians almost frantic; they are fairly white with anger, and are fulminating night and day against the threatened loss of a small part of their special privileges. This should convince our friends of the German Liberal League that they might as well demand all their rights as a fraction of them. The church will fight to the death against the smallest concession, and it can do no more than that if equal liberty is asked for at all times. Quite possibly it is good politics in Cincinnati, as elsewhere, to ask for and take—when it can be taken—even a very small slice from the loaf of freedom, but we should never dream of making the request for that slice the full measure of our demands. The whole loaf belongs to us in right, and sooner or later it must be in our possession, and so we shall insist that the clerical robber give up his booty, every crumb. As a cleric, he has no rights; as a man, he has equal rights with his fellow-citizens, no more. For particulars of the Cincinnati struggle, see the letter of Mr. Light, among the "Friendlies."

Henry Thurber, private secretary of President Cleveland, makes haste to declare that the story that his chief went fishing on Sunday is "an absolute falsehood." We suppose that Mr. Thurber is so emphatic because he thinks that fishing on Sunday is wrong, not because he objects to fishing. But the only valid objection to fishing on Sunday or any other day is the pain thereby produced, at the expense of the fishes, and we have never learned that these victims suffer less on the other days of the week than they do on Sunday. This is merely another instance in which the church moralists have inverted the moral code. It is a deadly sin, deserving of hell, to "desecrate" the twenty-four hours that intervene between Saturday and Monday by holding a pole over a stream of water, but it is all right to tear the mouths of the fishes to pieces with hooks on Saturday or Monday. What should we do for a moral guide if we lost the church?

The Kentucky court of appeals holds the law prohibiting the sale of liquor on Sunday to be unconstitutional. A man was arrested for selling liquor on Sunday, contrary to the provisions of the statute. He was fined, and he thereupon appealed to the higher court, which holds the statute to be in contravention of the Constitution, because it is class legislation. It maintains that the whisky seller cannot be discriminated against; that the statute to be effective must be general in its application; that the police power is not higher than the Constitution. Therefore, according to the opinion, a liquor dealer has all the rights of any other merchant, and if the state would suppress the Sunday sale of liquor it must do so under a statute which forbids the sale on Sunday of everything."—Galveston News.

The Kentucky court is undeniably right. All such legislation is class legislation, and, as such, within the inhibition of the Constitution. Cannot the barbers of this state and of California, where special laws against them have lately been enacted, take a hint from the decision of the Kentucky court of appeals and carry suits to the highest tribunals of their own states? In the same category of class legislation belong the new Massachusetts statutes against theatrical entertainments, which directly exempt sacred concerts, and, inferentially, all Sunday services of the churches. These statutes are unconstitutional. Get them affirmed to be such by the higher courts, and a staggering blow has been given Sabbatarian inquisitors. It is their plan to blanket us piece by piece with Sunday laws. Defeat them on their chosen ground, and see how long the people will submit to universal Sunday statutes, impartially enforced. The Sunday fight is on Now.

"Preaching has been shown not to be enough. Homes must be gone into and the people taught how to live. By transforming home levels and making church work more practical, many more will be brought into sympathy with the churches than have been heretofore."—Rev. Dr. Philpott.

The more people learn how to live comfortably the less they will care for the church. This is admitted on all hands by Christian ministers and editors, who often tell us that it is in adversity that the sinner turns to God; that "hard times" are the times when the revival flourishes, and observation satisfies us that the assertion is well based. As to church agents going into homes and teaching people "how to live," we should say that there is some impudence and a small amount of misdirected effort in such labor. We venture the guess that they will generally confine their attention to the homes of the very poor and helpless, as other "slummers" are in the habit of doing. To be told how to live by the emissaries of men who are doing all they can to force people by law to live as they, the clergy, demand that they shall, is carrying audacity to the extreme limit, and self-respecting and independent householders are very likely to teach these officious instructors some quite pertinent and timely lessons in manners. It is bad enough to have the representatives of the law, prodded on by the clerics, come prying about one's house and place of business, meddling in matters that in no way concern them; but when to this affliction is added the visitation of a horde of unofficial minions of the same clerics, the citizen may readily be excused if he does some very vigorous kicking that is other than metaphorical.

Rev. Dr. James M. Philpott, of the Lenox Avenue Union church (Disciple) of this city, began on Sunday evening, June 2d, a series of twenty-minute sermons on "Some Things to Think About," the first of the series being, "Is Protestantism a Failure in New York City?" (One of the things to think about is that a minister should find it advantageous to cut his sermons down to twenty minutes in length.) Dr. Philpott said that if the question means, "Does Protestantism reach all classes of the people? then it is a failure. If it means, Does it do the work it ought to do? then, too, it is a failure." But he thought that, nevertheless, it is not a failure. Numerically speaking, the Evangelical churches together stand where they did ten years ago. Then he added:

"The numerical test of growth is a poor one. It is uncertain, because you can't judge the strength of a church by its numbers. If in ten years a church stands in membership just where it stood before, the deaths just balanced by new members, it has done a great deal, considering this age of corruption and infidelity, in which non-churchgoing among the children of Protestants has become fashionable."

From which it appears that this minister thinks that perhaps Protestants may consider themselves lucky if they do no worse than lose relatively to the total gain in population, as they might lose absolutely in membership. The gentleman is easily satisfied. The Freethinker might well object to his coupling "corruption and infidelity," but that long since became a habit with the clergy, and it is too much to expect any general reformation just yet; only the better class of ministers are prepared to concede that disbelief in miracles and repugnance to the dogma of eternal punishment do not necessarily imply exceptional depravity of nature. Time and experience will convince the fairer minded among them that a man may believe that his fellows are too good to be damned or that God is too good to damn them, and yet not be ready to rob widows and orphans or cut throats at the first opportunity.

It is probable that there are hundreds if not thousands of editors of local papers in this country who are Liberal in their views, if not actually Infidel to the old theology. How much they could do to spread the light and check the aggressions of the ecclesiastics if they but had the courage of their convictions! Of course the main reason why they do not speak out is the fear that their orthodox subscribers and advertisers would starve them out of business. This keeps them, as a rule, not only from expressing their own views on many questions, but puts a great taboo on the discussion of those questions in their columns. Now, we have never believed that this fear of boycotting was very well founded. There are a few local editors who open their columns to their correspondents and a lesser number who speak out editorially, and yet they appear to be as prosperous as more timorous publishers, local conditions being approximately equal. A case in point is that of the Sunday Gazetteer, published at Denison, Texas, by Mr. B. C. Murray. The editor says what he thinks about religion and about the encroachments of the church, while his correspondents represent all phases of theological belief. The Gazetteer seems to have a pretty good advertising patronage and we presume that Mr. Murray does much job work at his power printing-house. In its issue of June 9th the Gazetteer has no less than eleven articles touching various aspects of religious questions, including unadulterated infidelity by the editor, a Jewish rabbi's view of the crucifixion of Jesus, a Universalist's plea for his faith, and a G. A. R. Catholic chaplain's reply to his A. P. A. critics. Mr. Murray's leading article is a long and scholarly examination of a Christian minister's defense of the New Testament account of Jesus's career. Such a paper is what we would call an honorable representative of the free local press. Freethinking captains of local newspaper craft! cannot you sail your vessels as fearlessly and safely as B. C. Murray does the Sunday Gazetteer?

News and Notes.

Wonderful and many are the mountain and sea views in the glorious land of Wales. I can scarcely describe the ever-varying prospects unfolding in sunlight and mist and cloud. Immense hills, cultivated to the very top, sweep away in the vast distance; lovely vales intervene, beautiful villages and ancient dwellings contrasting with the pomp and pride and circumstance of modern life, which now overflow these once wild and untrodden regions. Wales is a favorite place of resort for the fashion and wealth of England. Llandudno is an elegant seaside city, with superb hotels and residences, a delightful beach, exquisitely expansive of water, and rugged surroundings. The coaching tours, however, are the supreme thing, with the "tally-ho," the four-horse stage, with seats on high, as if you were riding on the roof of a house. It is an illuminating voyage through the air almost, I might say. I could take only two of them, as my time was short. I arrive at Llandudno from Liverpool, Wednesday, May 29th, at noon, and immediately take the trip through Synchuant Pass to Penmaen Mawr. We travel through the old town of Conway, about five miles distant, and view the ruins of its once magnificent castle, which for ages has towered upon this historic coast. With melancholy grandeur it greets the sun of to-day. It gives a noble idea of the massive structures of the old fighting times, when war was the normal condition of humanity. It would seem impossible to take this castle by storm, so impregnable are its defenses, so strong its towers and walls, protected by precipitous shores and frowning hills. One can imagine how things were in those tumultuous and bloody eras, now forever gone, with their glory and their chivalry. Beyond Conway we sweep into an amphitheater of magnificent hills, variegated with the splendor of modern thrift and invention. Every inch of ground is apparently used for man's benefit. There are no waste places. Even the Synchuant Pass makes pasture for the wandering herds and flocks. It presents a grand and romantic appearance as we plunge down its tremendous grade. The coaches here, however, don't go with the thundering whirl of our Californian stages. They put on the brakes in Wales, while in California they bid "farewell to every fear," and urge the horses to a resounding gallop. People are more slow and cautious on this side, and the traveler does not feel every moment as if he were launching into eternity. After Synchuant Pass we come to the charming village of Dwygyfylchi—pronounce it if you can, I can't. It is as much as I can do to spell it. Near by is the Fairy Glen, where, for the moment, as you gaze through the forest arcades and into the tumbling waters, one seems to be a thousand miles from civilization. On top of the huge hill which encircles the glen is the "Druids' Circle," an ancient temple of worship, one of the most remarkable remains of the dim and mystic past. The coach continues on to Penmaen Mawr, where the mountains reach down close to the sea, and where the sea stretches away with magnificent and ever-changing illuminations, sweeping to the horizon, or framed in with outlines of the vast and rugged coast. We return by a different route, where equally pleasing and exhilarating pictures adorn the pathway. In the evening thousands of tourists swarm along the sands or on the great pier. Music fills the air. The lights flare in a wide semicircle, the mountains glimmer in the dusky sky, the waters fling back the glow, and a scene of beauty and animation flows on until midnight. The morning hour is equally enchanting. The sun flashes over the surrounding pinnacles, the splendid buildings appear in gorgeous ranks, while the children and dogs and donkeys gather on the beach, and everybody seems to be in a mood of careless festivity, in unison with the magnificence of earth and sky.

My second day's drive is to Bettws-y-Cord. We leave at 10 o'clock in the morning, and return at 6 in the evening. It is a forty-one-mile journey, and the same vast and wonderful views constantly charm the eye, only they are not really the same, for our road lies in a different direction. Again we see the old castle of Conway, Queen Elizabeth's palace, "Peas Mawr," the Suspension and Tubular bridges, the Estuary and Carnarvonshire mountains. Beyond Conway we wheel on a different course. We climb great hills and thence proceed forward on a pleasant and elevated road, whence for fifty miles the eye can gaze upon the most stupendous scenery, conspicuous mountain peaks, whose names I cannot attempt to spell; tablelands and valleys, lovely lakes, and the winding glimmer of the river Conway, here and there. Sometimes the green forest wholly encircles our way, and the most brilliant emerald hues toss and roll away in the arching distance. Then we come to villages, nameless evermore, until more vowels are invented to fill in the battlemented consonants of the Welsh language, which I believe is the original language. Indeed it does, in its rhythm and rolling pronunciation, fitly re-echo the wild and wondrous scenery from which it sprang. The Welsh language is a musical language, adapted to poetic fire; and if you could only pronounce the names of its mountains and villages they would be most suggestive and beautiful sounds. About 50,000 people still speak the language, and it has a noble and charming literature.

Bettws-y-Cord is reached about noon, and we have a vigorous appetite. By this time all the passengers are well acquainted, and we make a jolly company. I do not so far find any unsociability among English tourists. We were all strangers when we began this journey, but were ready to join in for friendly intercourse, and at the close greetings were exchanged and hopes for further acquaintance. I find the same hospitality and frankness here that I do in the great West of our own country. Of course I only meet the traveled public. They are generous and polite. If they know you are from America they give you a hearty welcome, and treat you as their cousin from across the waters.

We stay at the Royal Oak Hotel for dinner, once the headquarters of David Cox, the famous artist. In the year 1847 he painted a sign-board for the hotel, which now hangs in the coffee-room, an object of great interest and a beautiful painting. It was the occasion of a remarkable lawsuit. When the hotel and its appurtenances were sold a few years since, the party selling endeavored to take away this picture as private property. The party buying claimed that the painting, being the signboard of the hotel, was one of the appurtenances. The court sustained this view, and the picture, now valued at £4,000, is a part of the freehold of the hotel.

Swallow Falls is a beautiful place. The falls are not large at this season of the year, but the almost flying waters dash in silvery sheen over wild, precipitous rocks in infinite variety of motion, while the foliage of a magnificent forest on either side adorns the pathway of the bird-like cataract.

On the return journey we take the Denbighshire side of the Conway River, but time will not permit me to delineate the picturesque views that with still different forms and colors unfolded in panoramic beauty.

On Thursday morning I take the Marine drive about great Orme's Head, a vast promontory towering seaward from Llandudno. One of the finest highways in the kingdom has been carved, we might say, about this mighty abutment, hundreds of feet above the rolling waters. The sea, the islands, the mountains, the villages, castles, and dwellings as you ascend and curve around this enormous crag gather and multiply upon the view. A circuit of almost immeasurable expanse is filled like a sparkling cup with grandeur and delight.

At one o'clock the same day I take the boat for Menai Straits and Bridge. The bridge is a stupendous structure, from which a view can be obtained of the straits, of the surrounding country, the village itself, the great railway bridge, and other objects of interest. It was a mosaic of exquisite beauty compared with the vastness and grandeur of former scenes.

The same evening I return to Liverpool. I am met at the wharf by my good friends, Mr. Lawrence Small, Mr. John Roberts, and others, and we spend a happy evening together, not in Liverpool, but in Bootle, a town of about 60,000 people, which adjoins Liverpool, and which Liverpool is trying to incorporate into itself. It is really a part of Liverpool, but prefers its municipal independence. Mr. and Mrs. Small give a cordial reception to the Secular Pilgrim. There was a feast of reason and a flow of soul among these radical comrades. Mr. and Mrs. Tarleton and Mr. Roger Pride join the circle.

I arrive at Bristol Saturday afternoon and meet London friends, etc. The delegates to the National Conference are coming in, and there promises to be a notable gathering of the clans, the colors of Scotland mingling with those of England. I become acquainted with friends whom I expect to meet further on in the campaign.

Sunday morning the conference comes together. They do differently here from what we do in America. They hold one day instead of three days. The morning and afternoon sessions are devoted to business, and the evening to speeches. I find the same elements here as elsewhere, plenty of individualism, some crankiness, hobbies occasionally, but, on the whole, frank sincerity, honesty of purpose, and when a question is settled a general determination to abide by the result and make the best of it. The main differences of opinion were about methods, and these will always occur. There was the largest latitude of discussion. Every one had a chance to talk. Quite a number of plans were presented, all of which received due consideration. From the beginning it was evident that Mr. Foote had the fullest confidence of the delegates, and there was no question as to his ability and fitness, or his heroic and generous devotion, and there was no thought of electing anyone else as president of the National Society. A difference of opinion existed as to the best way of doing things. But Mr. Foote is one of those who is always ready to receive suggestions. He is open to conviction and ready to accept any feasible proposition. He is exceedingly affable in the chair—patient, allowing the utmost liberty, while keeping strictly to the matter in hand. So that a most successful conference was held, a large amount of business transacted, and amicable conclusions reached. By the wise and courageous and, at the same time, genial administration of President Foote, the National Secular Society is in a better and stronger position than ever to-day. It fronts the future with a noble captain and a gallant company. My staunch comrade of the American campaign, Charles Watts, is also side by side with Mr. Foote in this strenuous combat. No one could be a more able and brilliant supporter than Charles Watts. He is growing somewhat gray in the cause, but he has all the sparkle and vigor of youth, with the wisdom and the amplitude of age.

The society also did honor to itself by re-electing R. Forder as honorary secretary. He has been a most faithful worker, an eloquent ally with Bradlaugh, Foote, and Watts. I am glad that women are also in the Freethought ranks, and willing and capable for frontier labors. Miss Edith M. Vance, the assistant secretary, has won the heartiest commendations of English Freethinkers by her loyalty, her activity, and her excellent business qualifications. Miss Annie Brown, secretary of the London Federation, has shown herself a reliable worker in placing that organization out of debt and upon a firm foundation for the future. I feel quite honored to be elected, with Charles Watts and others, as a vice-president of the National Secular Society. It is a proud position to occupy before the world, even if we are a poor and struggling host. I could not stand with a more royal company than the president, vice-presidents, and officers of the National Secular Society. I am quite sure that President Foote will receive the hearty support of all, and that there will be more enthusiasm and harmony than ever in the ranks of our English brethren.

There is no need in this report to give details of the conference. I point out simply the results, that with the widest difference of opinion on some questions, and a momentary clash at times, there is among English Secularists a splendid brotherhood. They have the same difficulties to contend with that we have; there are rough places, but the staying power is present. The army will suffer defeat only in the end to attain a greater victory. This conference was interesting to me in all its aspects. It was a sign of the times. There was a letting off of steam, but at the same time there was a gathering of electric force, and the lightning blow will come.

At noon we all took dinner together at the expense of Mr. George Anderson, who is a Secular philanthropist of the first order. He believes in creating good conditions for humanity, and then virtue will prevail. I assure him that the Freethinkers present enjoyed that fine dinner. It was a delightful occasion for sociability and general good feeling, and no doubt contributed to the unanimity of the conference.

The evening session was devoted to speeches, and I thoroughly enjoyed the varied and brilliant display of oratory. Mr. A. B. Moss did himself credit, and gave a splendid outline of the progress of Freethought. Mr. Parris was vivid and to the point. He was logic on fire, and roused the enthusiasm of his audience. Like myself, he has had a varied experience in the fields of orthodox and Liberal Christianity. He has tried them all and found them wanting. He, like Harriet Martineau, desires "the unfenced universe" and the wisdom of science in the place of the ignorance of theology. He made a rattling good speech. Mr. Gilmour is a true Scotchman, with the humor and the imagination of Burns himself. His was a breezy address, and received a hearty ovation. Mr. Cohen was born to be a rabbi, but by nature became a Freethought lecturer, and a most successful one, too. He is a man of promise. There was something of Hebrew poetry in his oration, the prophetic fervor, but all the superstition was gone, and it glowed with the hopes of humanity, the sublime and brilliant future of man. In my turn I did my level best to show that the supreme battle-ground to-day is the rights of man on both sides of the Atlantic, and that the most important and urgent reform is the Secularization of the State. Through this reform only can other reform be made triumphant and permanent. In this respect the English and American organizations are identical in their purpose. The manner in which my ideas were received convinced me of the noble friendship of our old-world allies. I was followed by Charles Watts, who spoke with his old-time eloquence and power, when he was wont to thrill and arouse the Freethinkers of America. The same impetuous oratory bore his audience to a splendid burst of enthusiasm. Mr. Heaford contributed a fervent discourse, which illustrated his excellent service in the field, and then Mr. Foote, as president, delivered the final address. Mr. Foote is one of those who has a great deal of reserve power, and he is ready for any occasion with unexpected abilities. He put the cap-sheaf to the speeches of the evening by pointing out the lines of present conflict; the inevitable battle that is to come between Rome and reason; that there will be a marshaling of hosts such as the world has never seen before, and that the banners of Freethought will shine victorious through the mighty struggle over a peaceful and happy world. Round after round of applause followed the utterances of the eloquent president, and the conference closed with bright memories and unconquerable hope.

Bristol is an old city of evangelical flavor. Robert Hall and John Foster radiated here in somewhat brilliant fashion. Lady Huntingdon and Whitfield and early Methodism in this place exhibited fiery faith. It is an orthodox town still. There are a few earnest Liberals, who will not go with the majority, but stand by their convictions and are ready to work. The churches, however, are numerous and solemn, and there is a somewhat slow appearance in the general aspect of the city. It has not the snap of a modern manufacturing town like Glasgow and Manchester. However, it is a charming residence city. There is an ample and fruitful country about it. On Monday, with my friends, I had a delightful drive among the environments of Bristol. Especially magnificent is Clifton and the scenery about it. Here is the great Suspension bridge over the Avon. The view along this massive structure is superb. On either side, between precipitous green and wooded banks, flows the calm, bright river. In the distance is caught a glimpse of the majestic Severn, and a wide expanse of fields and hills rolls afar. It is bank holiday, and throngs of people are sailing on the waters or meandering along the verdant swards and the wide pathways, an animating picture of outdoor English life. There seems to be after all an immense amount of happiness in the British Isles.

We return to London on Monday evening. The coaches are crowded, and there was a rush and tumult constantly, so many excursion trains were thundering and flashing along. When we arrived in London it was almost impossible to secure a cab or omnibus. Some of the party did not get home until 1 o'clock in the morning, and had to walk at that. But finally the holiday is over and all find rest and quiet.

Tuesday evening I visit with Mr. Watts, at whose home I have the pleasure of meeting Mrs. Littlehales, of Hamilton, Ontario, who is now on a visit to England. Mr. Littlehales is one of the Freethought standard bearers of America, whose hospitality I enjoyed when Charles Watts and myself first began our campaign.

Next week I shall visit Scotland, and I anticipate a new and wonderful pleasure in seeing friends and roaming over this renowned and romantic country, whose glories are not surpassed by any, and whose history will forever thrill the human heart.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Mr. Balfour's Theology.

Abstracted from the Fortnightly Review.

[Mr. Balfour, said to be a rising statesman of England, published a book not long ago in defense of supernaturalism and theology as opposed to rationalism and science. The work was naturally accorded a hearty welcome by the religious world, but something about its real value may be learned from the following review and reply by England's great philosopher, Herbert Spencer.]

The title of Mr. Balfour's work is "The Foundations of Belief." Belief in what? Not in any of those doctrines which he groups together under the name of Naturalism, but in the opposed doctrine, Supernaturalism—belief in a ruling power such as that which the current creed asserts. If the existence of such a power is tacitly assumed by the arguments urged in proof of it, the reasoning is circular. But unless the existence of such a power is assumed, how can it be assumed that the constitution of things is one which "ministers" to men's "needs and aspirations" or provides a theory which is "satisfactory?" In the absence of the assumption that things have been by some agency prearranged for men's benefit, there seems no reason to expect the order of the universe to be one which provides for men's "mental needs and aspirations," and that the truth of a theory may be judged by the degree in which it conforms to such expectation.

Tests furnished by other creeds clearly show this. If an American Indian, confidently looking forward to a "happy hunting-ground" after death, is told that there is no such place, is the fact that the creed offered to him negates his hopes a reason for rejecting it? When the baselessness of his belief in an unlimited supply of houris, to be hereafter provided, is shown to a Mohammedan, may he urge that his "needs and aspirations" cannot be otherwise satisfied, and that therefore his faith must be true? Or, once more, if to the half-starved and overworked Hindoo, to whom it is a consolatory thought that by placing himself under the wheel of Juggernaut's car he may forthwith ascend to heaven, there comes the demonstration that he cannot thus gain happiness, is the fact that the alternative belief is not "satisfactory" a sufficient ground for adhering to his superstition? Doubtless, the needs and satisfactions which Mr. Balfour has in view are of a higher order than those instanced, but that does not alter the issue. The question is whether the comforting character of a belief is an adequate reason for entertaining it; and the answer to this question is not to be determined by the quality of the comfort looked for, as high or low.

Briefly characterized, Mr. Balfour's book is a plea for supernaturalism versus naturalism, and unless his section insisting on the "beneficent part" which authority plays in the production of beliefs is without any raison d'être, it is clear that the aggregate of influences composing the authority which supports religion is set against the aggregate of influences by which rationalism, considered by him as a form of authority, is supported. The authorities which uphold theology and science respectively are the two in question. Let us, then, observe what happens when we test their relative values as we test the relative values of individual authorities.

From the days when Chaldean priests began to record eclipses, and, after a time, partially discovered the cycle they follow, and were so enabled to foresee their recurrence with approximate truth, down to our own day, astronomical knowledge has been growing ever more exact and more extensive, until now the celestial motions are so perfectly known that a transit of Venus or an occultation of Jupiter by the moon fulfils expectation to the minute. So is it throughout, the provisions of the chemist having reached such a stage that, foreseeing the possibility of an unknown compound which must have certain properties, he proceeds to form it, and creates a substance, which has never before existed, answering to his anticipations. If from this ever-increasing verification of scientific statements and inferences we turn to the guidance science has afforded, allied evidence everywhere surrounds us. Led by science, mankind have progressed from boomerangs to 100 ton guns, from dug-out canoes to Atlantic liners, from picture-writing on skins to morning journals printed 20,000 per hour, and that over all the developed arts of life science now presides scarcely needs saying.

With the authority of science, thus daily becoming greater, contrast now the opposed authority. Have the propositions constituting current theology been rendered more certain with the passage of time and the advance of knowledge, or has the contrary happened? Assyrian and Egyptian records, discovered of late years, have, indeed, served to confirm certain statements contained in the Bible, and so have tended to verify the natural part of the Hebrew story. But this yields no more reason for accepting its supernatural part than does proof that there occurred the feuds and conquests described in the Norse sagas yield reason for believing in Thor and Odin. Add to which, that if these agreements with Assyrian and Egyptian records tend to verify the Hebrew religion, then, conversely, it might be held by Assyrian and Egyptian priests, did any now exist, that such agreements verified their religions. Apart, however, from historic statements thus proved true, investigations, scientific and literary, have served more and more to disprove or to make doubtful those parts of the biblical narrative which constitute its theology. It needs but to contrast past confidence in them with present doubts and disbeliefs, to see that statements of this class have not, like those of science, become gradually clearer and more certain, but the reverse. Nor is confidence increased when we ask whether its guidance has been successful. After nearly two thousand years of Christian teaching and discipline, how near are we to that ideal life which Christian leading was to bring us to? What must we think of the sentiment implied in the saying of a glorified prince, repeated by a popular emperor, lauding "Blood and iron—a remedy which never fails?" Among the peoples who socially insist on duels, what advance do we see toward the practice of forgiving injuries? Or, turning from private to public transactions, what restraint do we find upon the passion of international revenge—revenge by the great mass insisted upon as a duty? How much moralization can we trace in the contrast between the practice of savages, whose maxim in their inter-tribal feuds is, "Life for life," and the practice of Christian nations, who, in their dealings with weak peoples, take as their maxim, "For one life many lives." Toward the foretold state when swords shall be beaten into plowshares, how much have we progressed, now that there exist bigger armies than ever existed before? And where are the indications of increased brotherly love in the doings of Christian nations in Africa, where, like hungry dogs round a carcass, they tear out piece after piece, pausing only to snarl and snap at one another?

Clearly, then, by the never-ceasing verification of its dicta and by the increasing efficiency and wider range of its guidance, science is gaining a greater and greater authority; at the same time that the authority of theology is being decreased by the discrediting of its statements and by its unsuccessful regulation of conduct. Hence if reason, whenever it abdicates in favor of authority, has to choose between the two, it is compelled to accept the authority of science rather than that of theology, where they are in conflict. So far from strengthening his own position by showing how large a share authority has, and ought to have, in determining our beliefs, it seems to me that Mr. Balfour strengthens the position of his opponents.

We must say that that high conception of a deity which exists in the minds of Mr. Balfour and others has had an historical origin. By what steps has it been reached? Beginning with the days when, as we are told, God walked in the garden of Eden, there has been a gradual falling away of human attributes—first of all the physical structure and accompanying needs, such as those which Abraham ministered to; then the lower desires and passions which later Hebrew books imply; until through many changes—now reactions toward cruder and coarser ideas, and now advances toward more refined ones—there has been formed the present conception, in which there remain only certain highest intellectual and moral traits, possessed in a degree transcending human imagination. So that, in fact, the movement of thought by which the existing consciousness has been reached is exactly the reverse of the movement alleged by Mr. Balfour.

The difference between Mr. Balfour's consciousness of that which lies behind appearance, and the consciousness of those he opposes (or, at least, of such of them as do not assume that there can be appearance without anything which appears), is, that whereas he persists in supposing himself to have thoughts when, under close examination, all the components of thoughts have vanished, they candidly admit that with the vanishing of such components all thoughts have ceased; leaving only a consciousness which cannot be put into any form. Not only have they dropped those early conceptions which imply that the power manifested in thirty millions of suns made a bargain with Abraham—not only have they ceased to believe that such inferior passions as jealousy, anger, and revenge can be felt by an energy which pervades infinity; but they have surrendered themselves to the final conclusion that not even the highest mental attributes conceivable by us, can be predicated of that existence which fills all space for all time.

It is not that they wish to do this, but that they must: self-deception is the alternative. There is no pleasure in the consciousness of being an infinitesimal bubble on a globe that is itself infinitesimal compared with the totality of things. Those on whom the un pitying rush of changes inflicts sufferings which are often without remedy, find no consolation in the thought that they are at the mercy of blind forces which cause, indifferently, now the destruction of a sun and now the death of an animalcule. Contemplation of a universe which is without conceivable beginning or end, and without intelligible purpose, yields no satisfaction. The desire to know what it all means is no less strong in the Agnostic than in others, and raises sympathy with them. Failing utterly to find any interpretation himself, he feels a regretful inability to accept the interpretation they offer.

HERBERT SPENCER.

The third volume of Moncure D. Conway's edition of the collected works of Thomas Paine is now on sale. Price, $2.50.

Observations.

Since the editor of the London Athenæum published the Letter of Junius written while Sir Philip Francis was in India, he has received so many communications from people who still believe Francis to have been the author that he has not printed any of them. He however gives room (May 25) to a note from Moncure D. Conway, now in England, and also to some further remarks by Mr. Rae, whose recent discovery of a Junian letter in the issue of the London Post for Aug. 24, 1773, revived interest in the subject and led to the present discussion. Mr. Rae takes occasion to speak highly of the American Junian researchers, and names a Mr. McCalmont, of Washington, as one of them, with whom he enjoys an epistolary acquaintance. Mr. Conway makes us notice that the Bonnevilles, Madame and Monsieur, kept a Radical bookstore in Paris, and that on the cover of the "Age of Reason," which they called "Le Siècle de la Raison," was advertised "Lettres de Junius, traduites de l'anglais (de Thomas Hollis). That was in 1794, when Paine was in the Luxembourg prison, and when Hollis, an English radical of some literary ability, had been dead twenty years. As a possible author of the Letters, Mr. Hollis makes his exit along with Francis, for he died on Jan. 1, 1774, while Junius, as shown by Mr. Rae's discoveries, wrote as late as September, 1774. One sentence in Mr. Conway's note is of especial interest. He says: "A school in America, headed by Col. W. H. Burr, of Washington, has set forth in a number of ingenious books that Paine was Junius." I call Mr. Burr's attention to the circumstance that although breveted by so humble an individual as myself, and even though his military career ended with blowing a fife in an ununiformed band, the historian has decreed that henceforth he shall be known as a Colonel on both sides of the Atlantic.

The New York Tribune, after printing a long discussion on the matter of the resurrection of Christ, announces as a result that the evidence presented "for the dogma of Christ's bodily resurrection is insufficient." To which the Tribune adds, absurdly enough, that though the "ephemeral dogma" may pass away, Christianity itself, which needs no proof, will remain. According to the latest criticism, the fall is a myth, the redemption is a figure of speech, and now the resurrection is judged to be an error. The Christian piece has exploded; lock, stock, and barrel are gone, and nothing is left but the echo of the report. These myths we can spare, but there are others that are still dear to our hearts. Said the master (Mat. xii, 40), "For as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." It was a remark of Paul that "if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain;" but that is not the worst of it, for if the prophet of Nineveh was a forerunner of Christ, and if Christ did not run according to program, then Jonah's three days in the whale's interior was time thrown away. We might give up the story of the cross and the resurrection, were nothing else involved, but if Jonah and the whale go with it, where are we at? Amateurs like the editor of the Tribune should cease monkeying with divine truths.

It makes all the difference in the world whose chicken gets the ax. In one issue the New York Independent (orthodox Christian) praises the legislature of Florida for passing laws prohibiting prize-fights and lotteries, and in the next condemns the same body for enacting into a statute a bill to prevent the coeducation of blacks and whites. In the second case it even goes so far as to recommend that the law be resisted. "An unrighteous law," says the editor with anarchistic vigor, "can never be submitted to."

About prize-fights and lotteries there is room for wide divergence of views. Pugilists in their methods remind me so forcibly of moral and religious bullies, like some legislators and all Sabbatarians, that I find it hard to feel any sympathy for them, and am not concerned whether they fight one another in the ring or have a go with the authorities in the courthouse. A lottery is another thing; it resembles a church except that its drawings are not all blanks and that the citizen is not compelled to invest. The law against coeducation is certainly "invasive," to use a Spencerian definition, and altogether abominable, for parents who choose to coeducate their children, like people who buy or sell chances in a lottery or the New Jerusalem, injure no one else by doing so; but why this law should be broken more than the lottery law, provided the lottery dealers define the latter as "unrighteous," is left unexplained by the Independent. The same authority, the identical legislature, is back of both. Neither lottery dealing nor coeducation is a crime in itself; there is no power that can make either of them illegal except the legislature, which has equal discretion in the case of both, and the citizens of Florida are under as binding obligation to obey the dictum of their law-making assembly in the one instance as in the other.

Touching laws that affect the relations of Negroes and Caucasians, I would here suggest that a legal enactment providing for the social equality of the two races (political equality not being here discussed) is impertinent and necessarily futile, while one denying such equality is still more impertinent and a tyranny to boot. Under the last head comes the Sheats law of Florida, against which the Independent would inaugurate a rebellion; and under the first comes the Malby law of New York, which puts hotel management under colored control. Any person of clear view should see that to compel the keeper of a hostelry to entertain a guest of one complexion when by doing so he excludes those of another, is a deep injury and neither equitable nor social; for, if the host is a white man, it coerces the Caucasian into paying in hard cash for the "social equality" of the Negro. Hotels, being under the necessity of maintaining themselves, and enjoying none of the patronage of the state, are on a different footing from public institutions, where the rights of all are theoretically the same.

But this goes slightly aside from the main issue, as raised by the Independent, which is, as afore said, Why are citizens of Florida advised to disregard the anti-education law, and at the same time to respect the anti-lottery law, provided that any of them should regard the latter as unrighteous? It may be argued that the first is a bad law and the last a good one, but that does not affect their authority over the citizen. And again, if we are to respect only such laws as are respectable, we might as well let the carcass go with the tail and inaugurate anarchy. The Sheats law is a bitter dose, but the Independent has swallowed worse and looked happy.

Members of the American Protective Association East and West should confer and find out how far their sentiments are the same. While hereabouts they are mainly conspicuous as the political wing of the Protestant church, and affiliate with the Republican party, on the other side of the continent the membership is largely heretical and partially Populist, and candidates for public office are generally distinguished as secularists. For this reason in a Western city which I have in mind, the Women's Christian Temperance Union is reported to have connubiated with the Catholics and the "saloon element" in order to defeat the A. P. A. ticket. This organization might learn a lesson from the Methodists, who, not finding themselves in agreement on all questions, have a church North and a church South. An A. P. A. East and another West would absolve the Pacific coasters from the sins of their brethren on the Atlantic side, and such may yet become necessary to the existence of the order. Mrs. A. C. Macdonald, mother of the undersigned, is one of the Western "wolves," being well up in lupine councils, and she is not quite so pious as I am. Her lodge has lately elected to the local school board a directress who will chase the Bible out of the school-room if it ever gets in. Whether that kind of work is done in the name of the A. P. A., the Freethought Federation, or the Catholic church those who do it deserve credit, I think. If with secular ends in view the Freethinking A. P. A.'s of the West stand off Protestant against Catholic, and if in pursuit of the same object the Freethinkers of the East avail themselves of Catholic influence against Protestant Jesuitry, as a war measure, both are quite excusable. East or West they have sense enough to change the combination when it begins to work the wrong way.

Why does it so often happen this way? A man named A. S. Moore, of New York city, now in custody for forging paper to near the amount of one hundred thousand dollars, has been for years a respected and "consistent" member of an orthodox church and a total abstainer from the use of tobacco and alcoholic drinks. I do not see anything in this case upon which "moral reformers" can base a demand for the legal enforcement of abstinence and the observance of religious ceremonies, and deem it quite probable that the Prohibitionists and theocrats will say nothing about it.

At a meeting of the Savings Bank Association of the State of New York, held last month, a member inquired: "Have any of the gentlemen present had any experience with Sunday-school superintendents as bank officials?" There being no response, he proceeded: "Well, I have. I have known three Sunday-school superintendents in the last few years who were also bank officials, and every one of the three was a defaulter."

The indispensable qualification for a jurymen under our system is that he shall not read the papers and that he shall have neglected all other means of acquiring information of a contemporary nature. This is understood, but I have only lately found out that the same deficiency fits a citizen for a place in the president's cabinet of fossils. Such, however, is the case, as Secretary of the Navy Herbert showed in his statement that Paine's "Age of Reason" had taken its place among the dusty volumes of forgotten literature. Perhaps it is too much to expect that a cabinet specimen like Mr. Herbert should know what is going on in the world of thought, but it is reasonable to require that in default of such enlightenment he shall abstain from communicating his ignorance to the young.

I have received the following memorandum, and am just nerry enough to print it here:

NO. 35 FULTON ST., NEW YORK, June 14, 1895.
TO GEO. E. MACDONALD: I notice in to-day's World your admirable reply to Secretary Herbert's misstatement before the graduates of the Agricultural and Mechanical College at Auburn, in regard to the circulation of Paine's "Age of Reason."
Your correction is so convincing and argumentative in style, so truthfully and judiciously written, that I beg the privilege of both thanking and congratulating the author.
Yours ever, PETER ECKLER.

The deep impression that London and its omnibuses have made upon the mind of Mr. S. P. Putnam, as revealed by his letters from that quarter, is attracting the attention of the reading public. And yet I cannot believe that anything he may see on the other side of the water can banish from the Pilgrim's mind his far wanderings in the Coos Bay, Gray's Harbor, and Puget Sound countries. Can he ever forget the Snoqualmie, Squak, and Okonogan? There is still a pleasure in the pathless wood, and much of beauty remains to be seen, in the localities indicated, from the roof-garden of a bucking cayuse. London is great, but picturesque-ness lingers in those regions where rolls the Oregon and hears no sound save its own dashing.

GEO. E. MACDONALD

A Few Words About Priestcraft.

I believe it is pretty generally conceded that in the history of ancient Egypt we have the oldest written records of the human race; and in the history of ancient Egypt we are told that, thousands of years before the pyramids were built, the Egyptians were highly civilized and had a civilized government; that the people were divided into separate castes, or classes, and that the richest, most powerful, and most arbitrary class was the class called priests. We are further told how the priests domineered and tyrannized over the minds of the people, and how they opposed every attempt at human progress beyond a certain prescribed limit. They assumed arrogant airs, and pretended to know far more about the will of the gods than all the world besides. They spoke with great authority in the name of the gods, and enforced their injunctions with all the priestly importance they were able to command.

Thus we see at what an early period in the world's history the priestly class became a privileged aristocracy and represented their services as of such great value and their power to influence the gods as so great that they were enabled to lay very heavy exactions upon the people. The priests claimed that it was their duty and their business to inform the people as to what the gods desired the people to do, and that it was the duty of the people to worship and obey the gods as the priests dictated to them, or else they would be punished everlastingly. Thus we learn that since the earliest records of the human race priests have so played upon the fears and ignorance of the masses that they have managed to live upon the best the earth has afforded, to dress in the best fabrics, to enjoy immunity from toil, and to be venerated as if they were superior beings. Their favor and influence were courted, and the greatest deference was paid to them. They acquired a control over the more ignorant classes that has continued for thousands of years.

The rule of kingcraft has been both expensive and cruel, but it has not been so exacting and so constant as priestcraft. It is this class of self-appointed agents called priests who have been the inventors of the almost countless numbers of creeds and religions which man has been compelled to sustain. It will hardly be successfully disputed or denied that priests have been the inventors of nearly all the gods, ghosts, saints, angels, souls, witches, and devils ever supposed to have had an existence. They have been the inventors of nearly all the myths, mysteries, and miracles. They invented a heaven for a bribe and a hell for a scare, to frighten their dupes out of their wits and out of their money. Priests have been the instigators of all the holy wars, holy massacres, holy persecutions, holy inquisitions, holy days, and holy bibles. Priestcraft has caused the people to be divided into hundreds of religious cliques and sects, with their sectarian animosities, mongrel creeds, theological dogmas, supernaturalism, and Sabbatarianism. The deadly hatred of priests toward science and scientists has retarded the progress of civilization for many centuries. It has paralyzed the intellect, exalted ignorance and credulity above reason, and filled the minds of the people with fear and anxiety about things of which absolutely nothing is known.

In this age of scientific knowledge, education, and growing intelligence, it is truly sad and deplorable to think that priestcraft is perpetuated mostly by means of Sunday-schools, where the immature minds of innocent children are polluted with pagan superstition, and these children are kept bound in the chains of ignorance and fear through life, unless they become intelligent enough to repudiate their early training. They must become Freethinkers and investigators, or remain willing and credulous slaves from the cradle to the grave.

THOMAS KNOTT.

A Junian Note.

Brother G. E. M.'s "strong fact" adduced in opposition to the identity of Paine as Junius is easily disposed of. Junius was a monarchist, and so was Paine until a year after Junius concluded his work. Paine tells us that in 1773 his views of monarchy began to undergo a change, from hearing the remark that "Frederick of Prussia was the right sort of a man for a king, for he had a deal of the devil in him." It was more than a year after Paine's arrival in America before he ventured to assail hereditary succession, and even then, says Cheetham, "his invectives against monarchy were intended against the monarchy of England rather than against monarchy in general." And Paine himself says: "No man was a warmer wisher for reconciliation than myself before the fatal 19th of April, 1775."

Junius did not always "use gall for ink." He praised and trusted ex Premier Grenville, hoping to see him rise again into place; but Grenville soon died. He defended John Wilkes, and solicited information from him. He inclosed to Lord Chatham a proof-sheet of the letter to Lord Mansfield, saying: "I will not presume to trouble your lordship with an assurance, however sincere, of my respect and esteem for your character and admiration of your abilities." And to Lord Camden, in a brief appeal appended to the final assault on Mansfield, he said: "I turn with pleasure from that barren waste in which no solitary plant takes root, no verdure quickens, to a character fertile, as I willingly believe, in every great and good qualification."

Paine had less occasion for gall than Junius, but he sometimes used it. Witness the letters to Lord Howe, Earl of Carlisle, Sir Guy Carleton, and the Earl of Sherburne, all in different numbers of "The Crisis." And what letter of Junius closed with such a scathing sentence as that of Paine to Washington? No wonder he suppressed it in a subsequent edition. Another most remarkable instance of gall is shown in "Forester's" reply to "Cato," who was the Rev. Dr. Smith, President of the University of Pennsylvania. Said "Forester":

"Thou hast called me by name; and if I cease to hunt thee from every lane and lurking-hole of mischief, and bring thee not a trembling culprit before the public bar, then brand me with reproach by naming me in the list of your confederates."

And "Forester" fulfilled his promise. The reverend Tory was driven into exile, and when he returned, a penitent patriot, he found his old antagonist, Thomas Paine, honored by a degree from the University of Pennsylvania. WM. H. BUAR.

Our Pagan Rulers.

It is very well to talk about securing a modification of an unjust Sunday law by increasing its odiousness through a strict enforcement. If New York city had the regulation of its local affairs, as it ought to have, such a law could never have been passed. If its continuance depended upon the votes of our own representatives at Albany a delegation could be sent up to modify or repeal it. But so long as we are at the mercy of rural legislators who can satisfy their own thirst from the family jug or cider-barrel, and achieve a political reputation for temperance by legislating against the customs and habits of the "wicked city folks," there will be no modification of the law. The more nearly it is enforced the better our bucolic bosses will like it.—New York World.

The Fiendish Infinit Machinist.

Suppose I have a room filled with complicated machinery—gears in rapid revolution; swiftly revolving shafts; belts flying; parts of the machines darting out, now this way, now that way. Just where I can easily put my finger upon it is a little spring, upon which if I press never so lightly, the action of all this machinery may be instantly stopped. At a point among the machines in this room I have placed toys of especial attractiveness to children. I introduce children into the room, point out the toys, and encourage the little ones to go among the machines to get them. Their eyes sparkle in anticipation of the pleasure of possessing the toys. They make the attempt. In threading the labyrinth of alleys the clothing of one of the little ones is caught by the gears. The child is drawn into a machine and shockingly maimed, or killed. When the kindred and friends of the little one come to question me about the matter, and learn that it was I who persuaded the children into that room, will they think me an intelligent and kind man? When they ask me why, if my design was only the kindly one to give the child a toy, I made the gift contingent on the child's escaping so many perils, what shall I reply? But when they come to know that I was looking on just at the instant its little frock was caught in the gears, and that by means of the spring I could have stopped the machinery instantly, before the child was injured in the least, will they believe me if I say I did not purpose the child's death? When they demand to know why I did not press the spring, and I reply that I really could not afford to arrest the operation of so vast a body of machinery, employed in the production of goods of such excellence, and in such demand, as mine—not even for an instant—and especially for so trivial a purpose as to save the limbs or lives of a few children, what will they do to me, do you think? Will they call me a good kind, benevolent man?

Well, God, if there is a God, has introduced us, children, into such a room—a universe filled with gears, and shafts, and belts, and darting rods. He incites us to attempt to reach certain objects very attractive to us. In threading the intricate passages, in our attempt to get them, notwithstanding all our caution—shunning the danger from the machine on this side, now the danger from the machine on that side, holding our skirts away from these gears, stepping briskly past the points from which the rods dart out, stooping to avoid that shaft, taking care not to become entangled in this belt—our ears are every instant pierced by the screams of some of our fellows who are being transfixed, mangled, or crushed to a shapeless mass. Distracted by so many cares, appalled by so many dangers, our very caution itself often precipitates us upon our fate. God, with infinit knowledge, knew we would be maimed or killed when he introduced us into the universe; the man did not know with certainty but that the child whom he inveigled into the room might escape unharmed. If the man may justly be judged to have acted with cruel intent, for stronger reasons may God be judged to have acted with cruel intent. No claim that God acts, in such cases, with a purpose of ultimate beneficence, can blunt the point of such a judgment—a God could have achieved and bestowed the good without the evil. He would have done so if benevolent.—John Francis Smith, in "Is the Universe Governed by a Devil?"

No Religious Teaching—No Ostracism.

Superintendent Carlisle has just decided that nuns are not eligible as teachers in the public schools of Texas on the ground that should they be allowed to teach the non-sectarian spirit of our constitution would be violated. The case came up from Victoria on an appeal from the action of the county in refusing to approve the contracts of an order of nuns who desired to teach in the public schools. Carlisle sustained the judge's ruling, and the matter was carried beyond the superintendent to the state board of education, which in turn sustained Mr. Carlisle.

The above is taken from an article in the Brenham Press. We have not seen Superintendent Carlisle's decision, but if his objection to the Catholic teachers is simply the fact that they are nuns, then he is wrong. If it is based on the supposition that they will insist on being dressed, while in the school-room, in the peculiar garb of their order, then he is right. Religion can be taught as readily through the eye as the ear. There should be no religious test in the selection of public school teachers, and no religious instruction, Protestant or Catholic, should be permitted in the schools, either orally, by peculiarity of dress, by reading the Bible, by praying, or by the singing of gospel songs. There is time enough out of school hours for parents and guardians to attend to the pupils' religious education, a matter with which the state has nothing to do.—Denison (Texas) Gazetteer.

Warring for Idols.

It is much to be regretted that so many possibly well-meaning men cannot rid themselves of the incubus of narrow prejudice and sectarianism. A dispatch from St. Louis tells us that Capt. I. S. Bristol, the new superintendent of the House of Refuge, has forbidden Catholic priests to celebrate mass or hold other special services in the institution. The superintendent said to a reporter of the Herald of this city:

"The sacrifice of the mass is idolatry. Moreover, the priests proselyte. It is their business. If they wish to come here and pray and sing hymns with the other city missionaries they may, but they cannot burn incense while I am here."

Captain Bristol is said to be a member of the American Protective Association, and, if so, it is to be presumed that he, in his actions and utterances, represents the order in that city, as it triumphed, by an alliance with the Republican party, in the recent election. It is evident that the celebration of the mass, and other Catholic services, have been forbidden, not because they are religious exercises, but because they are Catholic religious exercises. In other words, the "reform" starts from the basis of Protestant sectarianism instead of from the basis of secularism. St. Louis is to have, not separation of church and state, but the expulsion of Catholicism and the retention of religion, that is, of such religious exercises as are acceptable to the dominating Protestantism of the city. When Captain Bristol calls the mass "idolatry" he shows his animus and puts out the whole cloven foot of sectarian hatred. So far as "idolatry" is concerned, all religion is that; to the Freethinker the mass is no more idolatry than are the forms of worship that the superintendent is willing to permit in the House of Refuge, and those no less idolatry than the mass. By what interpretation of the principle of equal liberty is the Catholic inmate of the House denied the consolations of his form of religion while the Protestant inmate is permitted to receive the consolations of his form? Men of the stamp of Captain Bristol are antagonizing the encroachments of the Catholic church, not because they are the encroachments of a church, but because they are the encroachments of what the opposers hold to be a non-Christian church. As Christians, not as citizens, do they war against Rome.

This extract from the report of the proceedings of the National Secular Society's Conference at Bristol will no doubt interest Mr. Putnam's many friends:

"Mr. C. Watts then moved as a resolution arising out of the Report: 'That the members of this Conference hail with unqualified pleasure the presence among them of their able American co-worker, Mr. S. P. Putnam; and they wish to convey to him their appreciation of the great services he has rendered, and is still rendering, to the cause of mental freedom. Further, all present wish to assure Mr. Putnam of their earnest desire to have a visit from the great orator, Colonel Ingersoll; and they hereby kindly request Mr. Putnam to use his influence to induce the Colonel to cross the Atlantic at an early date, and to assure him that he would receive from the Freethinkers of this country a most genuine and enthusiastic reception.'

"Mr. Putnam said it had been the dream of his life to visit England, and when he returned to America he should report the work that was going on under the same flag here. It filled his heart with joy to hear the applause that greeted the name of Colonel Ingersoll. He belonged to the whole world; a citizen of the whole earth. His dominant thought was the sentiment of Thomas Paine inscribed on the walls, 'The world is my country, mankind are my brethren, and to do good is my religion.' Colonel Ingersoll had constant calls on his time. He had a great law practice, and, in addition, he devoted himself to Freethought. He had listened to Colonel Ingersoll's lecture, 'About the Holy Bible,' at Chicago with an audience of six thousand persons. He had up to the present only received a brief message, but one full of heart and sympathy for the English Freethinkers. Ingersoll loves and admires England. It would be a pleasure for him to come here, but there are great demands on his time. He, however, felt sure that the time was not distant when the great Freethought soldier of America would greet the English Freethinkers."

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Manhattan Liberal Club meets every Friday evening in German Masonic Hall, 220 East 15th street, New York, at 8 o'clock. Program for June:

June 28th—"What Are Women Here For?" Dr. M. E. Lazarus, read by Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr.

JOHN E. REMSBURG has just closed a four weeks tour of Minnesota and Wisconsin. He delivered thirty lectures at the following places: Laverne, Minn., May 28th; Heron Lake, 29th; Mapleton, May 30th and June 31; Sterling Center, May 31st, Fairmont, June 1st and 21; New Ulm, 4th, 5th, and 6th; New Auburn, 7th; Minneapolis, 9th; Arcadia, Wis., 10th and 11th; Independence, 12th; Whitehall, 13th; Blair, 14th; Seymour, 15th and 16th; Dale, 17th and 18th; Beaver Dam, 19th, 20th, and 21st; Lodi, 22d and 23d; Madison, 23d.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, for which please enroll me as a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and send me a copy of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." Respectfully, O. H. BIVINS.

SAN PEDRO, CAL., June 4, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $5. Please send THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year, and the "Pictorial Text-Book," also "Hypnotism," by James R. Cook, M.D., and for the rest some of Colonel Ingersoll's latest. LEWIS ANDERSEN.

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 10, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I was especially pleased with the tone of the paragraph on the Hannigan case in your last issue, of which a sample copy was sent to me.

I inclose $3 for a year's subscription and the "Pictorial Text-Book."

W. SCUDAMORE.

VANCOUVER, WASH., June 4, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed $8.50—$3 for a new subscriber, to whom send the "Pictorial Text-Book," $5.50 for my subscription and Paine's "Great Works" and "A Tale of a Halo." I must let you know that I never will give up the best paper in the country. We have started a Sunday-school in Vancouver and are making very good progress. Keep pounding away at that old structure, the church; it is crumbling away more every day.

The Retort Apt and Effective.

EDWARDSBURG, MICH., May 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: At dinner at the Schoch House, in this city, yesterday, H. Cobb, an admirer of Colonel Ingersoll, was asked how he liked Ingersoll's lecture at South Bend last winter. Mr. Cobb replied that it was grand, whereupon the Presbyterian minister of this place, who was present, remarked that when he thought of Robert Ingersoll and his flowery speeches it reminded him of the pond lily, which grows up out of the mud and murky water, and comes to the surface and blooms out a most beautiful flower. "Then," said Mr. Cobb, "you compare Mr. Ingersoll and his speeches to the pond lily growing up through mud and murky water?" The minister replied "Yes." "Very good," retorted Mr. Cobb. "Mr. Ingersoll grew up through the Presbyterian church." The thrust went home, and Mr. Preacher had nothing more to offer. Please send Mr. H. Cobb a sample copy.

Yours truly, H. B. MEAD.

The Cause in Oregon.

OREGON CITY, OR., June 3, E.M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: My recent lecture trip through Southern Oregon was one of the most successful and pleasant ones I ever had. I lectured eleven times at the following places: Turner, Aumsville, Corvallis, Junction City, Grant's Pass, Talent, Medford, and Ashland, and to over three thousand people. Then I returned to fill my regular appointment at Silverton, and delivered a Memorial day address to an audience of 450 people, including the G. A. R., who accepted the invitation of the Silverton Secular church to be present. The hall was appropriately and beautifully decorated, in the center of the platform being a magnificent cenotaph, the artistic work of the ladies of the Silverton Secular church.

In all of the above places I explained our Secular Sunday-school system, and at Junction City held a Sunday-school to illustrate practically the work. The people take to this feature of constructive Secularism with great enthusiasm, and it is only a matter of a little while when Secular Sunday-schools will be conducted in all these towns.

I wish to say a good word for the Agricultural College at Corvallis. It is doing splendid secular work, in that it systematically studies and teaches the laws of nature, affecting subjects pertaining to the farm. The only foolishness I observed, and that ought to be abolished because useless and an unlawful expenditure of public money, was the religious part of the chapel exercises.

I obtained 182 members for the Oregon State Secular Union on this trip, and the total membership now is 880, an increase of 443 since the last convention in October. I am sorry I have not time to tell you of the charming people, the beautiful country, and the generosity, kindness, and courtesy shown me on this trip. I am preparing to leave for Eastern Oregon this month, and besides many lecture appointments, arrangements are being made for three debates with Christian ministers, one of them to continue five evenings.

On the 2d of this month I resigned as secretary of the Oregon State Secular Union and as writer of its Sunday-school lessons. KATIE KEHM SMITH.

Science Is Against the Bible.

APPONAUG, R. I., June 10, 295.

MR. EDITOR: I have waited for an opportunity to write to you upon the subject of the Bible, and to give you some of my experiences. My father and mother were of the old Baptist persuasion, therefore I was brought up in the same to the time that I left home to look after myself, and that was when I was twelve years old. Young as I was I never could make up my mind to believe in the Bible doctrine, for there was too much of hell-fire in it for me to swallow, and when I went to sea and saw in foreign countries how Christianity was propagated, I began to open my eyes and to look about and think, and I said, "If that is what they call religion, I do not want any of it in mine, for it is nothing but superstition from beginning to end, and what they can see in it to be so fanatical about, I cannot for the life of me understand, or what ground they have for their belief. I cannot see anything but hypocrisy and backbiting."

Now, take the Bible—what is it? If any one can give me the information, I shall be glad to hear it. Take the first chapter of Genesis, wherein God is said to have created all things in six days. Did he do it, as the Bible says? Science does not say so, and where can we go and get nearer to the truth than by taking science? The Bible says this earth is only six thousand years old. Science tells us that this earth has been in existence for millions of years, millions of years before Mr. Adam was ever thought of, and as they tell us that Adam and Eve were our first parents, what proof is there of it? I can find none. But these expounders tell us to read the Bible, for it is a book of truth, written by men who were told by God to write it. Who were those inspired men who wrote the Bible? Were they vouched for by the Christian fathers of the early ages of Christianity? If so, I must say that they are rather poor evidence for the book. If the Bible is such a divine and holy book as they say it is, why do they keep revising it? They say the world is getting more enlightened, and we want to make the Bible as smooth as we can in order to keep the churches together and keep them in harmony with the Bible. Those they call the "poor heathen," to come right down to the point of the thing, are more enlightened than they are themselves. Instead of sending missionaries to convert and enlighten the heathens, I say, let the heathens send their missionaries here and try to convert and civilize the Christians.

The books that have put me to thinking of late are Kneeland's "Evidences of Christianity," "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," "The Old Testament Comically Illustrated," and the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book," which I never get tired of reading; but comrade Putnam's book takes the lead of all; I have been through it three times, and the more I read it the more interesting it gets.

Yours in truth, love, and hope,

JOHN R. SWEET.

Cincinnati Stirred Up Slightly.

CINCINNATI, O., June 12, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberal League of

Cincinnati is an organization of German societies in this city, which claim to have a membership of 70,000. The sole object of the Liberal League is the modification of the Sunday laws. The chairman at the recent mass meeting advocated a law whereby the saloons and other places of amusement could be open on Sunday afternoon and evening. The chairman was Col. Gustav Tafel, who is president of the League. The meeting was disappointing in point of attendance, there having been between 1,500 and 2,000 present, while the hall has a capacity of 5,000. Sunday afternoon, in the Young Men's Christian Association building, Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, of Washington, D. C., secretary National Bureau of Reform, lectured upon "The Duty of the American Youth to the American Sabbath," to an audience of about thirty, and in the evening he spoke at one of the churches, replying to the meeting of the Liberal League. At the meeting of the Young Men's Christian Association he ridiculed the Liberal League meeting because of the small attendance at it, calling it a "fizzle." He did not seem to realize what a fizzle his meeting was. He was very bitter against Mr. Miller, whom he and several other ministers heard. He spoke of Mr. Miller's "shallow sophistry," stating that those of his remarks which were not false were treasonable. Crafts showed his malevolence when he stated that if he were a judge he would disbar a man who made such false statements as he alleged Mr. Miller did. He spoke of Mr. Miller as an infidel who claimed to be an attorney.

In reply to Mr. Miller's statement that the Sabbatarians would prevent the delivery of milk on Sunday to dying babes if they could, he said that it was false, and that Mr. Miller knew it was false.

He stated and implied throughout his address that the Anti-Sabbatarians were in favor of everybody working on Sunday, and he then proceeded to show with his little chart, which he presented with a smile expressing his perfect satisfaction with it, that it was unhealthy to work seven days in the week. His little chart was indeed a "fizzle." The chart is an illustration of an argument that the rest at night is not sufficient to offset the work of the day, and that one day of rest in seven is necessary to bring back the normal condition. Incidentally he gave himself away when he stated that in resting on Sunday a person could and would be attending Christian Endeavor and various other church meetings.

At the close of his address he solicited membership and funds for the National Reform Association.

Of course that was not work, even though Dr. Crafts does receive a salary for engaging in this conspiracy against the Constitution of the United States. [Rather the conspiracy through the Constitution against the people of the United States.]

Mr. Miller in his address compared the musician in the theater with the musician in the church on Sunday, and the actor with the preacher, stating that each was engaged in work for recompense, and that one was no more entitled than the other to work on Sunday.

The press reports that at the ministers' meeting on Monday morning, they passed resolutions in which they condemned the holding of such a meeting on a Sunday night, as that fact in itself was a violation of law. Now the Liberal League meeting was held on Saturday night, and as the Ohio Liberal Society holds its meetings on Sunday night, and as the Ohio Liberal Society is often referred to by the press as the Liberal League, the reverend gentlemen evidently confounded the two. The ministers' condemnation of the Sunday night meetings of the Ohio Liberal Society is especially significant when considered in connection with Dr. Crafts' remark that in resting on the Sabbath, a person could and would attend the various church meetings. The true animus of the whole matter is shown right there. In their solicitude for the rest of the workingman, Dr. Crafts and the other reverend gentlemen most probably are so intellectually degenerate as not to see it in this light.

In their resolutions, the ministers speak of the enforced observance of the Sabbath as religious liberty, and Dr. Crafts stated at the Young Men's Christian Association that Sabbath desecration is worse than stealing.

It is very apparent that these wiseacres are impervious to reason and that the only thing to be done is to oppose them. Mr. Miller said it was proper not to observe such a law, and that the public officials were not required to resurrect and enforce obsolete laws. This especially angered Mr. Crafts and is what he calls treason.

Yours truly, GEO. E. LIGHT.

C. Severance Called to Time.

HICO, TEX., June 17, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Some kind friend has sent me a copy of your journal, issued June 1st, with an article marked from C. Severance, of Los Angeles, Cal.:

Judas was a good man, and only acted as God intended he should act. Now for the evidence. It is generally understood that God sent his son Jesus into this world to undergo crucifixion that his anger might be appeased toward sinful man through the shedding of that son's blood. I think there is no dispute on this point; therefore it naturally follows that God had to provide ways and means for consummating the death of Jesus, or be the executioner himself.

The principal sentence that your correspondent utters that the writer desires to correct is where he remarks, "I think there is no dispute on this point." Mr. Severance is correct in his statements, as far as the so-called orthodox and the self-styled evangelical sects are concerned. Yet there are two quite respectable denominations that have always disputed the absurd notions of the popular sectarian.

The Universalists and Unitarians repudiate the idea of God's anger, in the sense that our language attaches to that word. The true meaning that we attach to God's anger is simply the sure retributions that follow the violation of any law, physical, moral, or spiritual.

Judas had imbibed wrong ideas and was misled by the Pharisees concerning the true import of the kingdom that Jesus Christ was to establish. The Jews were expecting a person who would claim the Messiahship with supernatural power and in a miraculous manner liberate the Jewish people from Roman bondage. This was what Judas expected, and he was sadly disappointed. When he saw that mistake, he repented, and threw down the money. And if those who claim to be orthodox and call themselves evangelical would make as genuine a repentance, they would not be sending Judas and the major portion of humanity to endless suffering.

The environments that surrounded Judas caused him to do as he did. So with Jesus; they caused him to be a martyr to the principles he taught. The Jews were expecting a temporal king, to set up a temporal kingdom and government. Jesus taught moral and spiritual principles that would cause people to do right, to live in peace, and love mercy.

Jesus did not possess the power that Judas supposed, and suffered as a martyr. It is not necessary to attack the heathen ideas of what is called orthodoxy, to arrive at a reasonable understanding of the whole subject of true Christianity. When we examine what is taught by orthodoxy as the teachings of Christ, we find the system a base counterfeit. The Universalists and the Unitarians do most emphatically dispute the points made by Mr. Severance. JAMES BILLINGS.

[Mr. Billings less truly represents the Universalists than the Unitarians, especially the progressive wing of the Unitarian church. The gentleman seems to look upon Jesus as a merely human reformer, but such certainly is not the position of the Universalist church as represented either by its founders or its official creed. Rev. Hosea Ballou, commonly called the Father of Universalism, held to the distinctly orthodox doctrine that Jesus bore the sins of mankind. Or, as Mr. Severance would state it, God sent his son into this world to be crucified that his anger might be appeased. Mr. Ballou differed from the orthodox in that he held that Christ's suffering on the cross was a sufficient atonement for the sins of all, and that therefore there would be no punishment after death. One of the most frequently quoted texts relied on by Universalist champions is this from Paul's epistle to the Corinthians: "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." Article II. of the Winchester Profession of Belief, the only creed of the Universalist church, reads as follows:

We believe that there is one God, whose nature is love, revealed in one Lord Jesus Christ, by one Holy Spirit of Grace, who will finally restore the whole family of mankind to holiness and happiness.

All this shows beyond question the untenability of the position of Mr. Billings, so far as the Universalist church is concerned. With that sect as with the orthodox sects, Jesus is the savior of mankind, and it will not avail to say that he is their savior from sin instead of from hell, for if the infinit God of Theism is his father he was no more required to be sacrificed in order to save men from sin than he was to save them from hell. The essential thing is that he saves us, no matter from what, and in this belief orthodoxy and Universalism are agreed. Of the two doctrines, orthodoxy is the less absurd, for if we grant God—heaven—hell—Christ, it is not unimaginable that the death of the son of God does in some way we cannot understand save from hell those who believe in his mission, but we know that that belief has not saved mankind from sin.

Incidentally Mr. Billings remarks that Jesus "taught moral and spiritual principles that would cause people to do right, to live in peace, and love mercy." Some of the things he taught might indeed have that effect, but others would have the very opposite effect, have had the very opposite effect. But Mr. Billings cannot be a Universalist or a Unitarian unless he is also a Theist, and as a believer in a god he must admit that whatever the effect of the teachings of Jesus, that effect was foreseen and intended by God. Therefore he must concede, if he is as candid as the tone of his letter implies, that God intended all the persecutions, tortures, and murders that have flowed from the teachings and reputed teachings of Jesus. —ED. T.S.]

Equal Freedom for All.

EDMONDS, WASH., June 8, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I see in your number of May 4th, a cartoon—"A. P. A. wolf and Catholic hyena" after the public schools. My object in writing to you is to make an appeal to your better judgment, and good common sense, in regard to this matter.

I do not believe that you intend to place yourself in a false light; nor do I think for one moment that you are a hypocrite—a Jesuit Catholic priest in disguise—as I shall assume that you are honest in supposing that you are doing justice to all hands in your cartoon representation.

But now, dear sir, let me ask you if you had not better fully investigate the subject before you undertake to expose any man or body of men. I must assume that you do not belong to the American Protective Association, for the assumption that you are not a hypocrite, and downright traitor, must inevitably make clear the conclusion that you never joined the order. Now, let me ask you in all candor, Would it not be more just, more in keeping with your head lines—"The Truth Seeker"—to first know for yourself what the teaching and principles of that order are before you judge? And would it not be more manly to know first whom you are calling "wolf," before you publish a wholesale slander of their character? Now, I think if you were aware of how many noble men you were thus characterizing as "wolves," men that belong exclusively to your own "faith," you would hesitate before you did such an injustice.

Would it not enhance the circulation of your paper to do less stigmatizing and more investigating, so you would know whom you were classing as "wolves."

Let me inform you a little in my feeble way. In the first place, I have it from good authority that a large majority of the order of American Protective Association in this country are Freethinkers, Infidels, and Liberals. Rev. Mr. Daly, who spoke in Seattle not long since, told that vast audience that a large majority of the organization were Liberals, men who did not care a straw for any religion, only love of country, and were bound to defend its institutions at all hazards. In other words, were patriots.

Now, honestly, don't you think you are just a little premature in stigmatizing such men as "wolves?" Does it make such men place more confidence in the rest of your valuable paper?

Don't you think, honor bright, that it may lessen the esteem and confidence of many of the actual sympathizers with your labor to make the world think?

We know that there are scores of Jesuits all over our land insinuating themselves into every branch of our affairs, assuming the ministry and, with the garb of Protestant ministers, working with all their diabolical craftiness to capture the masses of the people, and engraft God in our Constitution.

We know that some of them have been exposed, and others we are watching with the eye of a sentinel on guard. We believe there are Methodists, Baptists, Universalists, Unitarians, in fact, all religious churches are tinged with them, even the Women's Christian Temperance Union is not free from them, and can be spotted with due diligence. Then, may it not be just possible that there may be one or two among our Materialistic friends? May not your position cause some of the watchful Freethinkers to suspect that it is just possible that you are influenced, more or less, by that very element? Stop a moment, and, with your usual calm judgment and good sense, see if it would not be better to know whom you were slandering, and whether you may not be using your useful columns for something not so useful, something, in fact, hurtful to you, to true liberty and our country's glorious flag? I have always liked THE TRUTH SEEKER since my old friend Bennett used to run it, and I do not want it to assume a position, either ignorantly or otherwise, that shall lower it in the esteem of the Liberals of this country. This is why these lines are penned. P. C. MILLS.

[So we are to be ranked as Catholics in disguise because we do not profess to see in a certain order what we cannot see? We are to be ranked as Jesuits because we are not willing to abandon the broad platform of secular Freethought to engage in a crusade to help out one division of the Christian church at the expense of the other and of the fundamental principles of equal rights and impartial liberty? We are to be ranked as enemies of the cause we have advocated for so many years because we cannot accept without analysis the pretensions of an infant organization whose originators and leaders were never known as Freethinkers, were not and are not Freethinkers, and who are working for certain political ends and in the interests of Protestant orthodoxy? We are to be ranked as opponents of the separation of church and state because we are not willing to assent to the expulsion of Catholic teachers from the common schools and of Catholics from the country, at the behest of Orange and other fanatics who have never shown that they have the most remote conception of the principles of religious liberty?

Our friend asks us to investigate. We have investigated, as he should know, for we have laid the evidence before time and again before our readers, and we certainly are not to blame if we are misunderstood. We are well aware that on the Pacific coast there are many Freethinkers in the order named, but their views do not control the order, as a national organization, nor color the utterances of its leading organs. In other words, the order is not what Mr. Mills and his Liberal friends think it is, and they would get at the facts in the case if they would take a more comprehensive view, a view embracing the whole Union. Has it not occurred to them that the order may not be wholly the same in different sections of the country, that a few Western lodges may be impartially secular in their intentions without committing the national body to that broad position? Perhaps an illustration from our current politics will assist in making this clear to our friend: As is known to all, Western coast Republicans and Democrats are favorable to the free coinage of silver, while Eastern Republicans and Democrats are opposed, and the latter have so far succeeded in dictating the policies of their respective parties in this matter.

Of the Demands of Liberalism, the three most important are those which ask for the secularization of the schools, the repeal of Sunday laws, and the taxation of church property. The American Protective Association demands the last of the three, but we are sorry to be compelled to say that, as a rule, the only reason given by their spokesmen for their opposition to church exemption is the growing power of the Catholic church; very little is said concerning the untaxed wealth of the Protestant churches, although, of course, the latter own much the greater amount of such property. In other words, there is lacking that cordial appreciation of the principle of equal justice which the intelligent and all-around Freethinker must see manifested in the utterances and actions of any class of men before he can identify himself with them. Regarding the secularization of education, we are unable to agree with the American Protective Association's scheme and its method of work. To all appearances, and judging by the evidences at hand, the order is fighting simply for schools controlled by the Protestants. It stands for proscription of Catholic teachers rather than for the real secularization of the schools. We have heretofore shown how it either actively or passively gives its influence for the retention of the Bible in the schools, and how the more or less closely affiliated organizations which work along parallel lines with it pursue the same policy and avow the same principles or permit them to be inferred from their platforms and the utterances of their papers and speakers. If the American Protective Association is actually opposed to the Bible in the common schools will Mr. Mills have the kindness to tell us why the platforms of the order, state and national, do not contain a word against that form of religious instruction in the school? We are not asking for glittering generalities—the order finds no difficulty in being specific and clear when attacking a particular church; what we ask is that it be equally specific and clear when speaking of the aggressions of the other churches. We are not here to pull hot chestnuts out of the fire for any church.

One of the most vital issues of the day is that of Sunday laws. We are hard-pushed on every side; Mr. Mills, as a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, knows something of the gravity of the situation; will he point us to a demand made by the national organization of the American Protective Association for the abrogation of Sabbath statutes? Will he point us to one made by a State organization of the order? If he should, possibly, be able to find one on the Pacific coast, can he find one elsewhere? And where has a state organization of the order or the national order or a state or national organization of the affiliated societies pronounced against the God-in-the-Constitution movement? Before THE TRUTH SEEKER is accused of Jesuit leanings and machinations, it would be well for our friends of the American Protective Association, et al, to place themselves on record against the treasonable schemes of the Protestant Jesuits, whose successes are paving the way for the success of the Catholic church, if it is to come, for it goes without saying that if the Protestants of the United States had stood loyally by the principles of the Constitution Rome would never have dreamed of Christianizing our constitutions and laws. As said before, we are not to be put off with elusiv, general statements; we well know what the indefinite declarations of political platforms are worth—that is, nothing. We want to know the official attitude of the order regarding the Bible, prayers, and psalm singing in the public schools; regarding the Sunday statutes, chaplaincies, religious proclamations, and all the other infractions of the law of equal religious freedom and denials of the Nine Demands. And do not forget the efforts to Christianize the national Constitution.

We cannot refrain from calling attention to the fact that membership in this organization of which we are speaking has so acted on the naturally fair and just mind of our correspondent as to lead him to hint that we, who were opposing with all our strength the encroachments of the church almost twenty years before the American Protective Association was born, may, after all, be a Catholic masquerading as a Freethinker because, forsooth, we are not ready to say that this society, which has not yet cared or dared to come upon the secular platform, is worthy of the unqualified indorsement of Freethinkers.—ED. T. S.]

Mortuary—A. D. O'Neil.

Arthur D. O'Neil, of 107 Park avenue, Chicago, Ill., at one time very prominent in the Liberal cause, died June 4th, after an illness of some three weeks' duration. He succumbed to a complication of liver and stomach troubles.

Mr. O'Neil was intended in early life for the Roman Catholic priesthood, but proved to possess too much mentality and rugged honesty. He lived in Chicago some forty-five years, and was considered one of the old residents. True to his convictions, by his request, neither priest nor preacher officiated at his funeral, on the 6th inst., but the services at the residence and also at the grave were confined to the simple burial forms of the Masonic lodge of which he was Master for many years.

A very large concourse of friends and citizens followed the remains to their last resting-place in Forest Home, attesting the personal esteem in which he was held.

A. D. O'Neil was a man of sterling integrity and of large business capacity, but of whole-souled geniality to those fortunate enough to possess his personal acquaintance. At his home Messrs. Watts, Putnam, and other Liberal lecturers have frequently been entertained by his charming wife, who, when they hear of this, will doubtless forward their word of consolation in her hour of affliction.

Mr. O'Neil was celebrated as an ornithologist, and was a member of the Audubon Club.

While a man of wide reading and broad ideas, Mr. O'Neil was alive to the material things, and left an estate generally estimated at $200,000. He left four children, A. D. O'Neil, Jr., Mrs. Dr. Wilson, Roy, and ———, who, with his devoted widow, have the sincere sympathy of

COLORADO SPRINGS, COL.,
June 9, E.M., 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have just returned from Calhan, Col., where I helped to bury a good Freethinker, B. L. Myers, who belonged to THE TRUTH SEEKER family. He was forty-eight years old, and leaves two sons, who are Freethinkers. Mr. Myers was a deep thinker, a truth seeker, and a noble citizen. He had the largest funeral this section ever saw, showing the respect the people had for an Infidel. One Christian lady who was at the funeral said she thought it was a shame to honor an Infidel more than they had been honoring the Christians when they died. He left none but religious enemies, every one admiring his honesty and integrity. All of his neighbors testify to his kindness. He was repeatedly elected justice of the peace where he lived. I have often heard him say that the truth was good enough for him, let it be what it might. He had been an unbeliever for many years, having been of the Paine and Voltaire kind, but he became an Atheist in later years. He requested me two years ago to conduct his funeral services on the Freethought plan, which I did as best I could, talking at the grave for a few minutes, telling the people his religious views, and reminding them that he did not recant his beliefs at death, having dropped dead without a moment's pain. His last words were addressed to his baby grandchild, which was playing in the yard. He said: "You little rogue, you will get dirty there," and in a moment after dropped dead. There ended a great life. CHAS. SPRADLING.

BERTIE CARNSNER.

Little Bertie Carnsner, five years old, the bright jewel of the Wagner, Or., Secular Sunday-school, is dead.

Young as he was, he took part in the exercises, and was always ready to give his recitations. He was a natural born musician, and would sit for hours at the organ and sing his little songs. He was everybody's favorite, and his death is a terrible blow to the parents, Mr. and Mrs. Warren Carnsner, who are subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER. The funeral services were purely secular, and were conducted by Mr. Wagner, member of the Sunday-school.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Joyous Junes of Childhood.

Where the bluebell's morning chimes
Made the thicket's azure rimes,
Pale sweetwilliams, pink and gold,
Gave us their sweet sheaves to hold.

There the strawberry's bush o' flame
Held the thrush's lamps o' hame;
There the crow-foot dropped her stars
'Neath the robin's whistled bars,
An' red rose-leaves in the rain
Furled their sails of rosy stain;
Indian pink, on hilly spires,
Lit the pure day's morning fires;
Tigerlilies crouched along
Summer meadows sweet with song.

Dipping in the streamlet's tide,
Fa'e, with silver leaf we tried,
And if so the leaves grew white,
Fortune's wheel had rolled in sight;
Secret wishes we should win,
With our white ships sailing in.

Poor wild roses faded and slipped 'Neath the plowshare's furrowed crypt;
Later channels deep and wide,
Turn them to the mem'ry side,
Where I find them in my dreams,
By the fields and singing streams.

With the deertongue's slender leaves,
Thrust amid our shining sheaves,
Golden thread made gleaming bands
For the harvest of our hands

Flying squirrels, free from harms,
In the dead elm's strong white arms,
Leaped across to leafy swings
'Mid the oak bough's whisperings;
Hazel branches' undertow
Called the human drift and flow,
Where we each had hurried view
Of the speckled eggs, or blue.

For the brown bee's honey wells
Columbine lent golden cells,
Leaning o'er the brook to drink,
In their tasseled robes of pink.

Honeysuckle's hollow shoots
Wrought a make-believe of flutes.
'Till we frightened with wild moods
A' the sweet birds from the woods.

Hickory trees whose breadth of leaves
Shamed the bishop's flowing sleeves,
Offered each a shimmering fan
For the faces fleeced with tan;
Thus their tattered boles are blent
With each summer's blanchiment,
While the joyous June day's laughter,
Echoes down the sky's blue rafters.

About Seals.

ILWACO, WASH., June 10, 1895.

MISS WIXON: One of our neighbors secured a baby seal of very recent birth. It was caught in a gill net, and weighs about fifteen or eighteen pounds. The upper part of the body is covered with short, thick, blue hair, with dark brown splotches. The belly is of a cream white. It has large, innocent, fawn-like eyes, and has a plaintive call which sounds like "Ma, ma." It drinks milk. Now, my pa wants to know if it is of the mammal kind, and is it "evolving" into the water or "evolving" out of the water? As we are not able to buy such books as would give us the desired information, you will very much oblige us by telling us what science says on the subject.

ANNIE SEEBER.

The seal which is referred to in Annie Seeber's letter is an aquatic mammal. It is different from other mammals on account of the structure of its limbs, its toes being included in one common frame, which converts them into fins. Between the outer covering of the body and the muscles is a layer of fat, which makes the seal round and plump. It has a large brain, and full, expressive eyes, as Annie has noted. She will also observe that the nostrils are capable of closing when under water. Seals travel together in herds, and in winter migrate to milder climates than arctic seas. They can remain under the water as long as twenty minutes at a time. They are good divers and fine swimmers.

In their family relations they are polygamous, the father seal supporting three or four wives. They are very fond of their babies, caressing and nursing them very carefully.

They like to get out upon the rocks to sun themselves. I remember one very enjoyable afternoon at the Cliff House in San Francisco watching the playful antics of the seals on the seal rocks a little way out in the ocean. The little ones playing with their mammas were very cunning.

As articles of commerce, seal skins are of two kinds, hair and fur skin; coats, cloaks, caps, and gloves being made from them, and seal products comprise a vast and profitable business. The places where seals are captured in large numbers are called seal meadows. They do not range far out at sea, and are usually found near the coast. They are sometimes taken in nets. Sea's are highly intelligent, and can be taught many tricks, such as bowing the head, kissing, and shaking the hand. They have been taught to feign sleep and to snore. They are gentle and affectionate, and when made captives they learn to know their keeper. There are several varieties of seal. The old Romans believed the seal to be a preservative against lightning, and they were accustomed to make tents of seal skin under which they crept in thunder storms.

The seal which Annie mentions as now in captivity, probably belongs to the group callocephalus, the color of which is generally bluish-brown above and yellow-white underneath. The male of the Greenland, or harp seal, is grayish-white, and the females are brown with black spots, while the young ones are snowy white.

S. H. W.

[The question whether the seal is "evolving" out of the water, or into it, is a very difficult one to answer, though some of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER may know. The seal belongs to the order of "marine animals of prey," and although it does not look like a land animal from the outside, yet its bones, especially those of the head, besides the way it bears young, show that it is closely related to some fish-eating quadrupeds that live ashore. Probably, says Haeckel, the seal originated out of a kind of weasel, which he calls Mustelina. The otter, the mink, and the muskrat may be relatives of the seal. "Even at the present day," continues Haeckel, "the fish otters, and still more so the sea otters, present a direct form of transition to seals, by adaptation to an aquatic [water] life, and how the steering fins of marine rapacious animals have arisen out of the legs of the otters." Seals, dogs, and otters are in the same line, the last being about half way between the seal and the dog. So it appears that the seal must have "evolved" into the water from the land, though writers on the subject never use the word. The whale also has arisen out of some land animal, probably a far-off ancestor of the walrus.]

Correspondence.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., June 2, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: We have had four heavy rains since May 22, which are helping the crops very much. I think we will have a large crop of oats. Our corn is doing finely since the rains have come, and probably we will get a crop of corn. Yesterday was my sister's birthday; she is twelve years old. There are a great many Liberals out here, but they are afraid to say what they think, for fear they will lose a lot of friends. My mother is writing Liberal articles for the county papers, and they are all publishing them.

We are going to have a great time the Fourth of July. The Penns are going to get up a celebration, and give every boy $5 that climbs a greasy pole. One merchant says that if a couple will get married, he will give a lot of presents out of his store.

REUBEN WAKEMAN ABBOTT.

[The boy whose mother works and talks for true Liberalism cannot fail to be brave and good, if he follows her teachings.—ED. C. C.]

TELLER, COL., May 30, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will now write to you again and tell you about the mines. Mamma, myself, and a friend of ours, went down in one of the mines. It was the Amethyst, and it is ten hundred and fifty feet deep. We went down only seven hundred feet and then ascended a ladder one hundred feet, up to the six hundred level; then we went in a tunnel that runs beneath our house six hundred feet under ground. There is a pump on the seventh level, and if it stops an hour the water will fill in the shaft four feet. The pump pumps two hundred and seventy gallons per minute. Then just a little way up on the hill is the New York Chance. Then above our house is the Happy Thought. There are several other mines that I will not mention, because my letter is getting too long. I send you a piece of crystallized lead out of the Amethyst mine.

Teller is a mining camp two miles above Creede. The snow is eight inches deep here now. How is that for summer?

I remain your Liberal friend,

OLIVE L. JEROME.

[A very interesting letter, Olive. We shall be pleased to hear from you again.—ED. C. C.]

ATCHISON, KAN., June 10, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It seems to me impossible, but I guess it is a fact, that one long year has elapsed since I last wrote to the Corner. I am ashamed of myself for being so delinquent, but hope you and the Cornerites will pardon me for so doing.

I have been having very poor health for some time, therefore have not had the energy to carry on correspondence. However, I am feeling pretty well again, and hope soon to regain my health.

If God is the father of this universe, and is so powerful as is claimed by some, why does not he care for his children as a father should and try to prevent sickness and make hearty, robust people of them instead of having them suffer and battle their lives away with poor health. I think such a father is a criminal and ought to be convicted for murdering his own children. I think before the world grows much older, that the superstitious, religious cranks will find out that their father above is not as much of a physical enabler as they have generally supposed, and will convict him for what I have just stated.

He gives what is supposed to be his medicine (which is compounded superstitious religion), but to those only that are mentally deranged; so we Freethinkers can give good reasons for not accepting his strong tonic, as our minds are clear in that respect; and I notice it makes cranks of those that do accept and those cranks (which you know) are of no use to human civilization.

Perhaps the almighty can operate them, but to what benefit? I think if he would apply them to grinding-stones and sharpen up some of these dull-headed ministers of the gospel (which would take several years' constant grinding) he might succeed in benefiting something; but as long as they are of no use to anybody, that long he would not succeed, and I think the world will be much better off without them. I suppose he has a life patent on them, but I hope not, at least, as it is a poor patent.

Well, as I am taking up too much of your valuable space with these cranks (but then you know it takes lots of room for them) I will close. Hoping soon to regain my health, but without the aid and assistance of the almighty and his tonic, I remain your Liberal friend,

JOHN J. I. REMSBERG.

[It indeed seems a long while since we heard from our friend John. We always think of him with pleasure, and hope to hear soon that he is enjoying that best of blessings, good health.—ED. C. C.]

Something QUITE NEW & UNIQUE
THE
BETTER WORLD
A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE
By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dived into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

The Bible: What Is It? A pamphlet containing eight chapters in refutation of the assumption that the Bible is a divine book of pure thought, and correct in all its utterances. Price, 25 cents.

Studies in Theology. A clear exposition of the biblical story of man's "creation," and "curse," theologically denominated "the fall." Price, 10 cents.

The Bible Against Itself. Containing one hundred and fifty plain self-contradictions of the Bible, involving questions of theology, morals, and history. Price, 10 cents.

The Human Nature of Jesus. A refutation of the assumption that he was a divine person, and that he was the fulfillment of Old Testament prophecies. Price, 10 cents.

Liberalism. Treating the subject from a negative and affirmative standpoint, showing what it is not and what it is. Price, 5 cents.

THE BRAIN AND BIBLE;

OR
THE CONFLICT BETWEEN MENTAL SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.

By EDGAR C. BEALL, M.D.,

with a preface by

R. G. INGERSOLL.

This is the only work of its kind in the literature of Freethought. Its arguments are based upon scientific phrenology, and appeal directly to the reader's sense of logic and love of justice. It is eloquent as well as convincing.
Price, cloth, $1. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to wealth of the leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures. This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, shall not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:
Ten copies..... $1.00
Fifty copies..... 4.50
One hundred copies..... 5.00
Larger quantities at special rates.

400 Years OF Freethought

By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pp., Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. $5.

With The Truth Seeker for One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES.

A new edition of that splendid prose poem "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who, now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt boveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

Gems of Thought.

If God made us in his own image, we have well returned the compliment — Voltaire.

If it be a duty to respect other men's claims, so also is it a duty to maintain our own. That which is sacred in their persons is sacred in ours also. — Herbert Spencer.

SCIENCE is inexorably hostile to supernaturalism — cannot recognize a particle of it. It knows nothing of a super-nature; with science all is nature, and nature is all. — W. S. Bell.

WHEN the political leaders of a people find that their dupes are disposed to turn upon them they do everything possible to save themselves by directing popular indignation toward some foreign country. This trick began with the world's first demagogue. — Galveston News.

THE church thought that the air was filled with devils; that every sinner was a kind of tenement house inhabited by evil spirits; that angels were on one side of men and evil spirits on the other, and that God would, when the subscriptions and donations justified the effort, drive the evil spirits from the field. — Ingersoll.

AGAINST the body of a healthy man Parliament has no right of assault whatever under pretense of public health; nor any the more against the body of a healthy infant. To forbid perfect health is tyrannical wickedness, just as much as to forbid chastity or sobriety. The law is unendurable usurpation, and creates the right of resistance. — Francis W. Newman.

THE world is not yet done with the law-maker. This ubiquitous character is not the man who goes to the legislature, but the man who sends him. Freedom will come when it is summoned. As much freedom has come as has been asked for. The debt is not of the natural to the artificial, but of each era to itself. We draw in the measure of our collateral. — Horace L. Traubel.

MANKIND has reached a point where a new sphere of thought is born. Whitman is the first great spokesman in literature of the cause non-ascetic — the naturalistic attitude toward nature and the world, accepting the body as coequal with the soul. His acceptance of the body, glorifying it and exalting it joyously, puts him in total opposition with ascetic Christianity. — William Sloane Kennedy.

LET nothing human be indifferent to you. Live in this world as of it; do not aspire beyond, but for and through and by it. Carry men on in your manhood nearer to truth, to justice, to nobility, and the joy which is their fruit. Repress no faculty, withhold no gift — spend all your treasure. Share thus in creation; and in the impulse you shall have given toward more full and perfect life be content to see your immortality. — Frederika MacDonald.

I KNOW of nothing more terrible than the poor creatures who have learned too much. Instead of that sound powerful judgment, which would have probably grown up if they had learned nothing, their thoughts creep timidly and hypnotically after words, principles, and formulae, constantly by the same paths. What they have acquired is a spider's web of thoughts too weak to furnish sure supports, but complicated enough to produce confusion. — Ernst Mach.

THE first postulate in every theory of the significance of existence has been — God. Suppose, now, the effect be tried of leaving God out. This the more readily as God accounts for nothing — needs accounting for just as much as the matters he is introduced to explain. Atheism does not "discharge life of its meaning;" it rather invests life with its highest significance, as if gods ourselves. While it is believed there is a God, somebody will always be pretending to know all about him — making respectability, civil privileges, life itself, depend on belief (real or simulated) of the fables or absurdities they may be pleased to invent regarding him. — John Francis Smith.

Now and then a time comes when the love of country demands the utmost sacrifices that can be made, when life and fortune have to be freely offered if national existence is to be maintained. But professions of high devotion — which are so easily made when there is no demand for anything but lip service — count for nothing, and at the present time the ones who best love their country are those who exhibit their devotion to her welfare by doing all that in them lies to aid the cause of efficient and honest government, and to improve the social and industrial well being of the too often unregarded millions of their fellow countrymen. — Boston Herald.

THE LIMITATIONS OF TOLERANCE.

A discussion between Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic R. Condit, Ex-Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, before the Nineteenth Century Club of New York. "Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him." Colonel Ingersoll maintains this, the others deny it. Mr. Condit is a Roman Catholic, Mr. Woodford a Protestant.

MATERIALISM: Its History, and Its Influence Upon Society. Dr. Louis Buchner.

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE WORKERS.

A consideration of the Marvels and Miracles of the New Testament. One of John Peck's best books.

MOSES BEFORE THE COURT, or The Forgery of the Old Testament. Dedicated to the Clergy. H. J. Seignuret, M.D.

THE NEW GOD. "It is an open secret that man has always made his Gods. They exist in and through him, as the image exists in and through the mirror. Take away man and you take away God — the image vanishes." This pamphlet, therefore, is a consideration of what kind of a God man should make. Samuel P. Putnam.

ORTHODOXY. A lecture by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and one of that great man's best. The subjects considered are: Orthodox Religion Dying Out, Religious Deaths and Births, The Religion of Reciprocity, Mohammed, The Destruction of Art, The Discovery of America, Copernicus and Kepler, Charles Darwin, Special Providence, The Latest Creed, God as a Governor, The Love of God, The Fall of Man, The Atonement, The Second Birth, Inspiration, The Reign of Truth and Love, The Wars It Brought, The Resurrection, The Judgment Day, Pious Evasions, "No Bible, No Civilization," Miracles of the New Testament, The Ascension, Casting out Devils, Necessity of Belief, Eternal Punishment, Some who Are Damned, What I Believe, Immortality. This lecture is on the famous text, "The Clergy know that I know that they do not know."

PERSONAL EXISTENCE AFTER DEATH IMPROBABLE. L. R. Smith.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS MASS MEETING AT LINCOLN HALL, WASHINGTON. Being the Speeches of Hon. Frederick Douglass and Col. Robert G. Ingersoll on the Decision of the United States Court that the Civil Rights Act is Unconstitutional. Fifty-three large octavo pages, of which Colonel Ingersoll's speech occupies 38 pages.

PULPIT, PEW, AND CRADLE. So long as the Pulpit speaks to believing Pews composed chiefly of mothers, the cradle will be rocked by ghosts and the race will remain on its knees to a devil of its own creation and to a God who is powerless against him. One of Helen Gardner's brightest efforts.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY BETTER THAN ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. M. Babcock.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS. One of L. K. Washburn's best lectures, and it is, like all of his, very good.

THE ROARING LION ON THE TRACK. One of M. Babcock's comical sermons.

SCIENCE vs. RELIGION, or The Conflict Between Reason and Superstition. T. O. Widdcombe.

ST. MATTHEW BEFORE THE COURT. Presenting the evidence of the forgery of his alleged gospel. H. J. Seignuret.

SISTER LUCY AND HER AWFUL DISCLOSURES REGARDING NEW HALL CONVENT. Showing that Convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom.

SPIRITUALISM FROM A MATERIALISTIC STANDPOINT. B. F. Underwood. Written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK. Torture Implements Employed in the 15th and 16th centuries for the promulgation of Christianity. Being the Nuremberg Collection, with specimens from the Holy Inquisition. 28 pictures. The descriptions and reflections by George E. MacDonald.

VICTOR HUGO'S ORATION ON VOLTAIRE, delivered on the one hundredth anniversary of Voltaire's death. Translated by James Parton, author of the Life of Voltaire. To which are added the three great poems of Goethe, George Eliot, and Longfellow.

WAS CHRIST CRUCIFIED? Austin Bierbower. A lawyer's consideration of the evidence of that alleged event.

WAS JESUS INSANE? A consideration of Christ's alleged acts which would lead one to that conclusion. L. K. Washburn.

WHY DON'T HE LEND A HAND? And other Agnostic Poems. Samuel P. Putnam. The title poem is perhaps the most popular of Mr. Putnam's many poems, and a great many editions of it have been called for. The other poems are: The Golden Age, The Ideal and the Real, Not Dead, but Living, Fruition, Hope, Thomas Paine, Nature's Gospel, Address to Deity, and the short poems often recited with great effect by Charles Watts, Give Us Light.

WILL THE COMING MAN WORSHIP GOD? B. F. Underwood; written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

HELEN had been teasing for permission to go to dancing school, and had been refused. "But why can't I go?" asked the child. "Because there are so many other things that I have to do for you, dear," her mother answered, "I cannot afford any more." "But can't I give up something else?" the child persisted. "Why, I know," as an idea flitted across the brain of this embryo woman of the world; "I will give up Christian Endeavor."—New York Tribune.

THE law compelling barbers to shut up their shops on Sunday is not so rigorous as a statute compelling them to shut up themselves would be, but it is more than sufficiently stringent, and might have been omitted without any injury to public morals or well-being. People have got accustomed to their ministrations on that day, and they present a smoother and more glistening aspect after their administration than before, making their choicer ornaments of the church, the thoroughfare, and the domestic circle. It is a useless, meddlesome law, which ought to be repealed as soon as possible. Its author ought to be seriously scraped by the first barber into whose hands he falls, and to have bottles of tricopherous urged upon him constantly during the process. It is a severe punishment, but not equal to his case. He deserves to wear a misfit wig for the remainder of his days and to sustain the flow of tonsorial conversation intermittently as long as the doctors think he can stand up under it.—New York Tribune.

To Most of the Four Million in and about New York: If you do not live in the way we live you are leading bad lives. We are but a few thousand in this vast American metropolis, but we know we are right, and we know everybody else is wrong. We know nearly all the four million try to make Sunday a holiday, to take their children out to nearby suburban resorts, to have them play base-ball and ride the merry-go-rounds and shout and laugh, to have young people dance together to pleasant music, while the old ones sit under trees and drink their lager or claret. Perhaps three million nine hundred and ninety-five thousand think this is the true way to keep Sunday, but we five thousand say that it is the wrong way. There must be no games for children, no dancing for youths and maidens, no lager, no wine for those grown up. Sit under the shade trees if you will, but meditate on the certainty of death. Therefore, yesterday we tried to close up many suburban playgrounds; in one place we scaled the fences and invaded the grounds. In the city we compelled men to lie and dodge policemen to get a drink. We are few, but we will never weary in our efforts to change New York from an international metropolis into a big Paritan Podunk Corners.—The Holier Than Thou, in the Evening World.

I have berries, grapes, and peaches, a year old, fresh as when picked. I use the California Cold Process; do not heat or seal the fruit, just put it up cold, keeps perfectly fresh, and costs almost nothing; can put up a bushel in ten minutes. Last week I sold directions to over 120 families; anyone will pay a dollar for directions, when they see the beautiful samples of fruit. As there are many people poor like myself, I consider it my duty to give my experience to such, and feel confident anyone can make one or two hundred dollars round home in a few days. I will mail sample of fruit and complete directions, to any of your readers, for eighteen two-cent stamps, which is only the actual cost of the samples, postage, etc., to me.

A small farm of 10 acres 88 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water, good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes walk of the railroad station, 9 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes walk.

The place is specially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1,000 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest, overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

One Spanish colonel has committed suicide because the major of his regiment deserted to the insurgents, taking with him many of the soldiers.

THE government having been defeated on a small issue, the Rosebery ministry has resigned and Lord Salisbury has been called to form a new ministry. The object of the Liberal ministry in resigning while yet having a nominal majority in the Commons is to force the Tory ministry to declare a policy in Parliament before going to the country for a new election. The Tories may be able by a technical ruse to defeat this plan and go to the country on the old issues made by the Liberal party.

THE fire-bug plot now being unearthed in this city through the confession of one of the conspirators, seems to have been one of the most extensive schemes of the kind ever hatched in the brains of unscrupulous men. There are involved policemen, business men, and fire insurance officials. An adjuster of one of the insurance companies has been arrested. He has lived in fine style, was a churchman, a model husband and father, and very generous giver to missionary work. Two of his daughters are teachers in Sunday-school.

MISS REBECCA FREEM, the Sabbatarian crank and spy of the East Side, has at last got the police wholly under her control. She having had complaints preferred against those who would not act upon her information. They now obey her implicitly, and the storekeepers shut their places when they see her coming. The arrest of barbers for the violation of the new Sunday closing law goes merrily on, and it is expected that it will soon be unlawful for a man to shave himself on Sunday. Such a law would be constitutional if the Collins law is constitutional.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

I have made $1,640 clear money in 87 days and attended to my household duties besides, and I think this is doing splendid for a woman inexperienced in the business. Anyone can sell what everyone wants to buy, and every family wants a Dish Washer. I don't canvass at all; people come or send for the Washers, and every Washer that goes out sells two or three more, as they do the work to perfection. You can wash and dry the dishes in two minutes. I am going to devote my whole time to this business now, and I am sure I can clear $5,000 this year. My sister and brother have started in the business and are doing splendid. You can get complete instructions and hundreds of testimonials by addressing the Iron City Dish Washer Co., 145 S. Highland Ave., Station A, Pittsburg, Pa., and if you don't make lots of money, it's your own fault.

EDITORIAL

From the Freethought Magazine.

"The advertisement of that well-known Freethinker and distinguished jeweler, Otto Wettstein, appears in our advertising pages. Mr. Wettstein is worthy of the patronage of the public. He is an honest man that can be trusted. Whatever he agrees to give you are sure to get, as we have learned by experience. Brother Wettstein is doing grand, good work for the cause of Freethought, and is entitled to the consideration of the Liberal public."

The subject of the above eulogy claims no credit as a writer or scholar; his efforts in that line are crude, and simply the "Musings" of his few idle hours. But he does claim to be a first-class jeweler. Has worked at the bench for forty-five years; is a natural mechanic, art critic, acute judge of goods, close buyer, and does business on minimum degree of expense. His FREE-THOUGHT BADGE is conceded to be the most artistic and expressive emblem ever designed. His "OTTO WETTSTEIN" WATCH combines all the qualities of a first-class timekeeper at one-half the usual rates, and his COLONEL INGERSOLL SOUVENIR SPOON is without question, the finest specimen of the die cutter's art ever produced. It is his aim now to establish himself as YOUR JEWELER.

THE OLD BRUTE'S LATEST WHELPS.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price two dollars).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

What a New Subscriber, Who Has Received His Pictorial Text-Book, Says of It.

LAMAR, Mo., May 8, 1895.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is received, and after a careful examination of the work I unhesitatingly pronounce it one of the most impressive Freethought works ever issued from the press. It will indeed "corner the parson" and all his flock, and I shall take great pleasure in showing the book to my orthodox friends. As a reference book it is invaluable, and it should find a place in every Freethinker's library.

Respectfully, W. F. BAILEY.

For $6.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and S. P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" ($5). Large Octavo, 1150 pages, gilt sides and back, marbled edges—the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press. 140 Half Tone Engravings of the Prominent Freethinkers of the past four centuries.

The object of this work is to present the Course of Freethought throughout the Civilized World from the time of Columbus and Bruno to the time of Ingersoll. It is a radical Historic Record of the greatest developments of the human race. It reveals Freethought as an intellectual, moral, literary, social, industrial, and political movement. It shows what Freethought is in itself, how manifold are its influences, and with what promise we can hail its future triumph. "FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT" embraces the most illustrious pages of human history, adorned with the brightest genius, radiant with the most splendid poetry, rich with the greatest inventions and discoveries, and ennobled with freedom's most shining advance. Nothing can be more interesting or more inspiring to the pioneer workers of to-day, to those who are still in the van for human rights and progress. No Liberal can afford to be without this book. It contains the greatest thoughts and the greatest deeds of the greatest men in one harmonious and magnificent whole, a vivid picture of man's sublimest evolution, with the added glory of woman's emancipation from the chains and slavery of a barbaric church.

Darwin and After Darwin

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.
By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers: "Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. "Christianity Has a Hard Time Before It."

Such is the confession of Rev. W. S. Rainsford, one of the most popular orthodox clergymen of this city. And he is a quite liberal man, too, as ministers go. He is an Episcopalian. The Times of June 10th reports him as saying in a service of the Archdeaconry of New York that "it is getting harder every day to get people to come to church." He added: "It is getting still harder to get the common people to come, and I feel discouraged at the outlook." Is this reluctance to partake in the services of the church due to the increasing depravity of the people, as some ministers assert? Dr. Rainsford answers the question, in direct connection with the remark just quoted:

"Yet at the same time the sense of pity is permeating us to-day as never before. The sorrows of others grip us until we feel their burden, as Joseph of Arimathea felt the weight of the cross. We are realizing as we never did before the idea of sacrifice."

This is vastly significant. If the world is growing more kindly at the same time that it is more and more absenting itself from church, how are we to classify the strenuous exertions of the ultra orthodox to compel people to go to church by closing on Sunday every other place where they can be amused and instructed? Does this not prove that the Sabbatarians are in fact fighting against the better elements in human nature? It is certainly true that as the church loses its hold on the faith and affection of the masses it appeals to the ward boss, the wire-puller, the shyster politician, the law-manufacturer. Dr. Rainsford's melancholy confession is significant also because he is one of the hardest workers among the clergy of New York, interesting himself in and organizing his parish for "practical charity."

He says that "a wave of sympathy with suffering is passing over the civilized world," and he appeals to the church to get in touch with the common people. This is one more admission that the progress of the race is due to the natural aspirations and sympathies of man rather than to the acceptance of supernaturally-revealed creeds. Regarding the much-boasted increase in church membership, Dr. Rainsford forcefully says:

"I know the census and the figures which show the increase of church attendance during the past ten or fifteen years, but the common people are getting further and further away from the church. Hundreds of thousands who never darken the doors of a church are set down as church members. In the census returns many persons are counted over and over again. I myself know one man who is set down as an attendant by seven different churches."

It would be profitable unto truth if other clergymen and also church lay officials would tell the world what they know about the stuffed membership lists of the churches of God. With such experiences as those hinted at by Dr. Rainsford it is not a matter to wonder at that the theocrats were so expert in getting up the forged and dropsical petitions to Congress for the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday.

Dr. Rainsford wants Christians to "consecrate their best and brightest boys to the service of the Christian ministry." But is he not asking the impossible? Can a decaying church draw to its active service the best and brightest of the youth of any generation? The present tactics of the political church will draw to it the cruel fanatics, the unreasoning bigots, and the unscrupulous time-servers. Every new law that the Sabbatarians and other theocrats get into the statute books will help to deplete whatever vital force the church still possesses. Let the National Reformers succeed; let them amend the Constitution; let them establish their state church; let them bar non-professors from the service of the state and from the ballot-box—let them accomplish all the treason to liberty that they design, and they will fill the church with scoundrels of every kind and degree; they will create the paradise of the hypocrit and the hell of the honest man; they will make the Church of America such a cesspool of corruption as was the Church of Rome when she was the heartless and shameless mistress of Europe. No, Dr. Rainsford, you cannot expect young men of warm sympathies and keen intellects to enter the ministry of a church that is on the decline, a church whose creeds are rejected by the leaders of the world's thought, a church that substitutes for living faith the club of the policeman and the key of the jailer. Not yet, fortunately, is the church the only door to preferment.

Dr. Rainsford says that "the Greeks looked on their children as the fairest offering for the gods, while we send one child to succeed his father in business and the others to the callings for which they show a preference." Well, Yahveh of the Jews was not an inhabitant of Olympus. Certainly the beauty-loving Greeks would have been loth to sacrifice anything to such as he, if the Bible portraiture of him is at all accurate. Of course our pessimistic clergyman has cause to feel despondent in this matter; he assures us that the rector of one of the most prosperous churches in New York tells him that "in fifteen years not one member of his congregation had been consecrated to the Christian ministry." Judging from the partial statistics we have seen, we should estimate that considerably more than half of the divinity students in the colleges of the country are the sons of farmers, and a large proportion of the remainder the sons of villagers and townsmen. Christianity is the paganism of the nineteenth century.

Evidences of Progress by the Press.

It is encouraging to know that some of the papers of the country are not at all times and concerning all subjects in mortal fear of the church. Recently three of the dailies of New York have been speaking out in a most refreshing way. The World has attacked the Sunday laws of this state, and Sunday laws in general, frequently and with most trenchant argument. It has not stumbled in its logic nor thrown any sop to the Cerberus of either church or society. It has spoken clearly and unequivocally for the Free Sunday. The Evening Post has likewise hit the Sunday superstition squarely in the face. In its issue of June 15th it has a long editorial on "Sunday Casuistry," in which it comments in an ironical and sarcastic and withal most sensible vein on the facts concerning the Sunday law of England which have just been brought out by the special committee of the House of Lords appointed in connection with the new Sunday bill drawn by Lord Hobhouse. The Post's presentation of the absurdities of the law is too good for our readers to lose, especially when we take into consideration the fact that the strictures on the English law are many of them directly applicable to our own Sabbatarian statutes:

"Under that act, as judicially interpreted, you may lecture in public on Sunday, but you have to be very careful what theme you choose. Lectures about religion are allowed. This would be expected, but your lecture may be against religion, it may be positively Atheistic, and yet, because falling under the general religious category, it will not bring you within reach of the secular arm. Lectures on morals are likewise immune, and charity and social reform are legal themes. But beyond these you go at your peril. If you venture to address a miscellaneous audience on the Lord's day on literature or science or art, you are in danger of being arrested and punished as a keeper of 'a disorderly house.'"

The Post wonders what would become of a great many sermons if "the law against Sunday addresses on science or literature or art were strictly enforced against them."

"Does the mere starting off with a text and closing with the usual solemn formula turn a confutation of geology into a legal sermon, while, without those ornaments, an exposition of geology is 'disorderly'? How could Chalmers's famous astronomical discourses have been delivered under a strict enforcement of such a law, or Kingsley's Eversley addresses on geology, or Robertson's defense of Tennyson? Not lawful to lecture on science on Sunday!"

Of course, the Post well understands that "sauce for the layman" is not "sauce for the clergyman," although it asks the question as though it expected the ministers to answer that there is "one law for all." Again, the Post's fine irony:

"Another subtle distinction of the English law relates to the discrimination of Sunday lectures which are 'amusing or entertaining' from those which are stupid and depressing. The latter are presumptively legal, the former betray their devilish parentage on their face. If it should be said that this part of the act was evidently drawn so as to make sermons fall clearly within the law, we know not what answer could be made except to assert, with George Eliot, that every sermon has at least one point of thrilling interest—when it is finally over."

Other legal hair-splittings relate to the question whether admission to Sunday lectures is free or paid for, whether Sunday music is sacred or secular. Free lectures are presumably lawful; if they are of a sort people care to pay to listen to, the chances are that they are pestiferous and illegal. The Leeds Society went down in court under the double charge that its lectures were both amusing and cost sixpence to hear. Evidently the two propositions support each other with beautiful logic. If the defense argued that the lectures were not amusing, the prosecution was ready with the triumphant question: "Why, then, do people pay sixpence to get to them?"

The committee of the Lords struggled desperately to find a clear distinction between secular and sacred music, but the Post thinks its labor was thrown away. It says that the "commonest musical setting" of Keble's hymn, "Sun of my Soul," "is nothing more nor less than the adaptation of a waltz rhythm," while many tunes which to pious church-goers "have only the most holy associations" are "primarily suggestiv of the worldly Italian operas from which they are taken." As to church organ music, a "voluntary" may have been originally an address to a heathen goddess.

"It would seem a rational view to take that, as the spread of musical education has been so rapid and the elevation of musical taste so marked as to make it impossible for thousands of people to ticket off any longer the music which inspires and uplifts them as sacred or secular, the law had better not attempt anything of the kind."

Can it be possible that the Post really expects our law-carpenters to act on such a sensible suggestion as that? Why, only about three months ago the Solons of the province of Massachusetts passed an act forbidding any person to give or attend any "public diversion, except a concert of sacred music," and the governor, with the love of God and the votes of the poor overworked actors and singers shed abroad in his heart, signed the paresis-born measure. The closing remarks of the Post are deserving of the careful thought of all Christians who imagine that there is some saving virtue in an enforced observance of Sunday:

"The instances cited, with many others that might be adduced from American as well as English experience, leave an unpleasant impression as of a network of casuistry extending over the entire question of Sunday observance. We believe, in fact, that not since the reign of the rabbis has there been so much moral confusion in this whole matter. Rabbinical ingenuity devised as many ways to "beat" the Jewish Sabbath laws as a Tammany district captain ever employed to beat the election laws. The Christian rabbis are now the ones to make the impalpable distinctions that save the wary observer of them. Meanwhile it is reassuring to note the growth of tolerance, in churches as well as in society in general, in respect to modes of Sunday observance, the reluctance to enforce to the letter outgrown laws, and the clearer perception that the only value which attaches to any kind of observance of the Lord's Day resides in the perfect freedom and spontaneity with which the individual practice, whatever it be, is chosen and followed."

The Tribune has lately had much to say, editorially and otherwise, concerning the alleged resurrection of Jesus. In its issue of June 2d, it remarks that when it printed the letters of Mr. Archibald Hopkins (who avowed and gave his reasons for his disbelief in the dogma) "there was room for an honest difference of opinion as to the wisdom of raising such a question in a secular journal." Now it is satisfied that the discussion thus precipitated "was both timely and useful." This is a decided gain for the cause of free investigation. These two statements of the Tribune's, taken together, amount to the declaration that there can now be no difference of opinion as to the wisdom of discussing religious questions in secular papers. THE TRUTH SEEKER itself could not have put it more strongly.

The Tribune says that the dogma of the bodily resurrection of Jesus, in common with the other traditional dogmas of the church, is being challenged by the critical spirit of the age, and that, while we know what Christian tradition says about the alleged event, that is not sufficient. We should know what the candid thinkers and investigators outside the church think of it, and what answer the spokesmen of the church can make to their criticisms. What has been settled by this discussion in the Tribune? That journal's summing up of the question at issue will be found on page 421. It brings us back once more to the Catholic church as the sole custodian of Christian evidences and the supreme authority in the domain of Christian tradition and dogma. If the Protestant elects to prove the alleged resurrection, he must go to Rome for his testimony, and if he is content to rest his case on the authority of the Bible, to Rome again he must take his way, for, as his own Dr. Lyman Abbott says, "the Bible is founded on the church," it is "a record of church work;" "to build the church on the Bible is to lay the foundation on the superstructure."

The Tribune of June 23d gives an admirable summary of Herbert Spencer's crushing reply to Balfour's "Foundations of Belief," portions of which reply are now appearing in THE TRUTH SEEKER. The New York daily significantly remarks that "it is not too much to say that he [Spencer] has driven the brilliant statesman into a corner whence he will find it difficult to emerge with the honors of war." The article shows that Spencer's "intellectual strength has suffered no decline." The Tribune's closing paragraph is delicately and keenly ironical:

"Those who accept religion on the authority of a divine revelation will not be troubled by Mr. Spencer's brilliant article; but to those who try to prove religion as they would a problem in geometry it will suggest many difficulties."

In other words, those who would act as reasoning beings will find Herbert Spencer's article very difficult to answer, but those who discard reason and depend on blind faith in the authority of the church will not be disturbed by it, for the position they take precludes the necessity of answering any argument—indeed, to venture to do so would be nothing less than blasphemy.

Oh No, Not on Religious Grounds!

The Sunday law advocates would like to have it believed that they want Sunday statutes so that the wage worker can rest, but they have not explained why, if this is true, and they really do not wish to get rivals out of the way of the church under a pretext, they do not simply ask for a law that will give each wage worker a day of rest in each seven, and permit those who employ themselves to do as they please about resting on Sunday. Neither have they reconciled their fierce antagonism to Sunday music and amusements with this claim of philanthropic interest in the wage worker. But every now and then they inadvertently unmask, and then even the dullest can see what they are after. A case in point is found in the expression of the hope by Father Cronin, of Buffalo, some time ago, that the Collins bill for the closing of barber shops on Sunday would become a law—"Give the bosses and all the understrappers a chance to say their prayers and ramble through the summer woods at least once a week." The editor of the Catholic Union and Times does not give any reason why the barbers who wish to work on Sunday should be denied the opportunity so to do that others may go to church and say their prayers. If the latter think praying more important than shaving, there is no law to prevent their acting as they think. As to the "ramble through the summer woods," Father Cronin is doubtless aware that comparatively little work is done in barber shops on several days of the week and that, consequently, it is very easy for the workmen to get a day off during the time between two Sundays. There is no need of a tyrannical and religious law.

The Soldier, a religious paper, published at Columbia, S. C., by Rev. L. L. Pickett, in an argument for Sunday says that "the church needs it to combat sin, to preach the gospel, to do our Lord's work." Of course this is admitted, but who seeks to deprive the minister of his liberty to preach and pray on Sunday? Is he equally considerate of the claims of others? No, he wants a monopoly. He is determined to have a Sunday Trust, fully legalized by city, state, and nation.

In California a state Sabbath Union has been organized. These are its officially declared objects:

"To promote religious influence by state legislation, and by county and municipal ordinances; to prevent all open acts of Sabbath desecration, and to secure by law the observance of the first day of the week as a day of rest."

The italics are ours. Comment seems to be scarcely necessary. The third statement is only a blind; it is inserted merely to catch the money and votes of those wage-workers who do not stop to think that no good can come to the laborer by making labor a crime on one day of the week, and that the securing of a certain amount of rest is perfectly feasible without invading the rights of any man or giving the church authority in the state. To promote religion by legislation and to punish work and recreation on Sunday as "desecration" of the "law of God" are the real objects of the Sundayites, and we should be grateful to them for showing us their hands in that brazen fashion. And then to think that California, in the face of such shameless avowals as this, and swarming with Infidels, should have permitted the theocrats to sneak a Sunday law into the statute book in the name of "rest"! The pity of it! Must it always be true that man has to be coerced by the logic of events before he can understand and respect the logic of justice? Are the American people never to awake to the realization of the fact that they are in a life and death struggle with the church militant, until the guns of the Fort Moultrie of theocracy rain destruction and death on the Sumter of religious liberty? Will we permit the theological fanatics and the political hypocrites to bind us in manacles of steel, "light thread on thread," until we are weighted to the earth with the burden of state and federal legislation in the interest of the church—and in the name of labor? Is there indeed no limit to our capacity to swallow the silly flattery and transparent lies of the theocratic confidence men? The Sunday fight is on Now.

New York Under the Harrow.

When the representative of THE TRUTH SEEKER was in Albany last winter endeavoring to get the Assembly Excise Committee to look at the Sunday closing business in a rational way and repeal the whole Sunday law instead of tinkering it in the interest of a special class of business men, he was told by several of the legislators that he was right, and that our way was the only right way, but they didn't dare to recommend the repeal because of the Puritan element in the community.

Since then New York has been put under the screws of the Sunday law, and has become what our Western friends call a "jay" town. Everything, about, has been closed on the "Lord's day," and the town has had to go "dry" until the bibulously inclined are forcing the saloon keepers to start "speak-easies," like those in Philadelphia, or the "blind pigs" of Kansas and Iowa.

With this liquor fight we have no fellowship, for whether a man gets his usual drink or not is a matter which concerns him alone. It is enough to say of the excise law that it should be the same for Sundays as for week days. But what does concern the whole community is the invasion of personal rights by the church through the Sunday law. Closing the liquor shops will not, does not, content the church. She intends to close everything on Sunday except the churches. Ministers and priests alone are to be allowed to labor and earn their salaries. All others must stop. That is their ultimatum to the people of this cosmopolitan city, where every nationality and habit of life is represented, and where everybody is supposed to have the right to do as he pleases so long as he does not deprive any one else of his rights or infringe upon them.

These puritanical Christians have even gone so far as to threaten their fellow Christians with the law. The Seventh-Day Adventists publish a paper here, and the men employed thereon are good Christians and keep their Sabbath, which is Saturday. Then they work on Sunday. Last week a police officer walked into their office and ordered them all out, and told the manager not to permit them to labor on Sundays. Of course they did not obey the order; and although no arrests have yet been made they are liable to occur at any time. And the question comes up, How did the police know that these people were working quietly in their office? Undoubtedly some fellow Christian furnished the information. The ministers are determined to rule the town and protect their own industry.

If New York long submits to this sort of thing we shall be greatly mistaken. And yet last winter when we were working in the interests of true liberty, we got no aid from the ones who are now suffering from these tyrannical and invasive laws. This practical imprisonment on Sundays serves them about right, and if it shall wake them up to a realizing sense of the monstrous tyranny of the churches it will be a splendid thing. But will it? Will they have the manhood to shake off the shackles of superstition, and tell the minister and priest to mind their own business and earn their salaries without infringing upon the rights of the people who do not directly contribute thereto?

Referring to the "Woman's Bible," now in course of preparation by Elizabeth Cady Stanton and others, the Catholic Union and Times speaks of Mrs. Stanton as "the venerable maiden"! Is it possible that Father Cronin is so far behind the times that he does not know that Elizabeth Cady Stanton is a wife, and the mother of many children, some of them already known to fame? Or does think that she is a modern "Mother of God," unaffected by the vicissitudes of maternity? In either case, Father Cronin should come down into this century.

Since our last acknowledgment was made we have received for the Fleckten Bible in schools test case in Minnesota the sums here specified: H. Wilbur, $5; J. P. Eldridge, $1; S. J. Fleckten, $8; Silas Latham, $10. This is well for the beginning, but we hope all our friends will remember that $200 more is required. A decision in our favor would be of great help in the struggle for secular education.

"The crushing of liberty is a big job in these days."—New York Tribune.

Then how do you account for the easy success of the bigots, faddists, and invasiv cranks of all kinds who are loading down our statute books with meddling, freedom-denying laws? If it is so difficult to crush liberty, why do we hear of the enactment of ten—yes, fifty—new oppressiv statutes to the repeal of one old one?

The Catholic Review says that "it goes without saying that religion is the only sure foundation of morality." It is a curious coincidence that two men have just been sent to prison in England for an offense that was the pet indulgence of many of the popes, although several of the latter killed their victims when tired of them, an actual invasion not charged against the London men. The church should keep very quiet about morality.

It is claimed that some Christian Endeavor young people have the disagreeable habit of singing in their sleeping cars a good part of the night, to the extreme annoyance and pain of the passengers who wish to sleep. Yet we presume that these thoughtless youths and maidens are very much concerned lest the absence of Sunday laws or their non-enforcement should lead the barber at Rural Corners to "disturb" his neighbor by shaving his customers on Sunday, or the Tennessee Adventist to raise a cyclone of noise by plowing in his back field on the priest's day.

While Kansas has many sins for which she must answer, it is well to bear in mind that she is scarcely more responsible for the persecution of Moses Harman than is Maine or Virginia. He is not imprisoned under a law of Kansas, but under the law of the United States; to be sure, the jury that found him guilty are citizens of the Sunflower state, but they were in the service of the federal government and merely obeyed the commands of a federal judge, the appointee of the president of the United States. The prosecuting witness against the editor of Lucifer is an agent of the federal postal system and is a citizen of another state. It is simply the accident of residence that Mr. Harman is in the Kansas penitentiary; the law that struck him down in Kansas would have reached him in any other state, and the spy and informer, McAfee, is not limited in activity by the lines of provinces. This is written in connection with glorious Lucy N. Colman's otherwise most just remarks.

Several of our friends have asked us why we do not publish THE TRUTH SEEKER at a lower rate, evidently forgetting the experiment in that direction once made by Mr. Bennett, with the result that the end of the year found us with an uncomfortable debt on hand. In view of that, the following experience of a Christian paper is interesting:

"The New York Examiner has absorbed the Christian Inquirer. The latter paper was started seven years ago, with the view of proving the feasibility of publishing a low-priced paper. The experiment did not prove a success. Speaking of the matter, the Examiner says: 'Our own experience, which, by virtue of its extent, deserves attention, has shown us that even at $2 a year the subscription receipts do not even approximately cover the cost of publication, and at the end of each year it is necessary to make large drafts upon the income derived from advertising. These drafts are obligatory, irrespective of the size of our list, and are to be accepted as an immutable law of journalism.' In spite of the wisdom of this long experience, many will continue to repeat the experience of the Inquirer."—Christian Standard.

If a Christian paper, with its hundreds of thousands of sectarians to draw upon, cannot succeed, how can it be expected that THE TRUTH SEEKER can do so? And further, we have no advertising patronage worth speaking of, for the large advertisers are afraid that if they patronize us the Christians will boycott their goods. Our subscription list must pay the expenses of the paper, or they cannot be paid. We trust this will be a sufficient answer to those friends who have asked us to reduce the rates.

When the Chiefs of Police met in convention in Washington on May 15th there were two hot fights over the election of a chaplain, and it was decided by a very close vote to have one. There is a clause in the constitution of the organization which provides that the meetings shall be opened with prayer. It is gratifying to know that the majority in favor of the performance was small, and we should be glad to get a list of the voters for and against. Chief Oliver, of Athens, Ga., led the fight for those who thought that they stood in need of prayers. The pagan gentleman said that "if there was any department of the municipal government that needed the aid and assistance of God it was the police department." We have known a few chiefs of police and are somewhat familiar with the records of more, and this has led us to cherish the opinion that those who need the "aid and assistance of God" are the poor and unfortunate whom the chiefs and their subalterns rob and terrorize.

Rev. Dr. David J. Burrell, of this city, commenting on the quoting of scripture by Mr. Choate in the Laidlaw-Sage suit, says that such reference to the authority of the Bible was just and wise, "the more so as equity and jurisprudence are founded on the Decalog, as are also the laws of state and nation." Were the equity and jurisprudence of Greece and Rome founded on the Jewish Decalog? Was the jurisprudence of the Germanic tribes, before their conversion, in any way based on the Ten Commandments? And yet did not the laws of all these peoples hold murder and theft and rape to be crimes? How many of the commands of the Decalog are now enforced in civilized countries and states? What do we think of the enlightenment of the state that forbids religious liberty? And that is just what the First commandment does. Catholic Rome did that, Presbyterian Scotland did that, Prelatical England did that, Puritan Massachusetts did that. Would Dr. Burrell return to either? What people obeys the Second commandment, that forbidding the making of images and likenesses? Is it answered that the making of them was not forbidden, only the worship of them being barred? Very well, admit that, although the text is outraged by the interpretation, what then? What civilized state forbids idolatry? As to the Third commandment, most of our states do forbid "profane swearing," but only a few of the least progressiv retain the statutes against "blasphemy," and the laws against profanity are rarely, if ever, enforced, except when the swearer makes himself a nuisance by his boisterousness. We are yet sufficiently under the influence of priests to attempt to punish "Sabbath desecration," but we are not savage enough to punish it by stoning the offender to death, as the Bible commanded should be done, and the sentiment of the enlightened world is against the superstition of holy days. We do not compel men by law to "honor" their parents, being content to require minors to obey their parents so long as the parents treat the children fairly well. Neither do we hold it to be a crime for one to "covet" the property of another, including his wife and other servants, thinking it sufficient to take him in charge when he permits his desire to ripen into deed. Yes, Dr. Burrell, the educated and humanized world has got a long way from the Decalog, as regards the First, Second, Third, and Fourth commandments, and while it respects the spirit of the Fifth and Tenth it does not attempt to pry by law into the secret feelings of the child or man for the purpose of arraigning him at the bar of justice. The other four commandments, or, rather, the acts condemned by them, are taken cognizance of by the civil power, although some enlightened states do not deem it just or expedient to make the Seventh a part of the criminal law. It is needless to say that all these commandments had their origin in the experiences and delusions of the race, even the ones that have to do with the supposed duties of man to a God, and the only essential peculiarity of the Jewish Decalog is that the god it was intended to protect from rivals and insults was the tutelary divinity called Yahveh. The consideration of the facts herein adverted to should convince the Rev. Dr. Burrell that he made altogether too sweeping claims for the Jewish Decalog as relates to its alleged incorporation in the codes of equity and the systems of jurisprudence of modern peoples.

The Resurrection of Jesus.

The question at issue is a simple one. Is the resurrection of Jesus a historical fact? That is the question; and there are two, and only two, ways in which it may be answered. We may accept as divinely true, and therefore conclusiv, the declaration of the Bible or the church, or both. Or we may put it to the test of a critical investigation, applying to it such rules of evidence as rational men would demand in the case of any other like marvelous story. These are the two attitudes with which we may approach the question; and it is evident that they are mutually exclusiv of each other. The man who accepts the doctrine on the authority of the Bible or the church is estopped from any critical investigation of it, first, because, according to his view, he needs to seek no further, and second, because any admission on his part that the question is open is dishonoring to the divine authority he acknowledges. It is equally plain, on the other hand, that the man who can believe as a historical fact only what can be proved such to his reason cannot accept the ipse dixit of any man or body of men without parting with his honesty and his reason. So long as his reason impels him to demand evidence, and evidence only, he is under an obligation to disregard mere tradition, as sacred and binding as the mind of man can conceive.

Here, it seems to us, lies the whole point at issue in the discussion. It indicates the parting of the ways for those who hold and those who reject the bodily resurrection of Jesus. Christians who accept the dogma because they believe that God revealed it in the Bible occupy a position that is entirely tenable, and in a certain sense impregnable. For nothing can overthrow them except the postulate of the insufficiency of a revelation and the need of evidence; and that postulate they are bound by their principles to deny. As a matter of fact, however, most Christians to-day do not remain on this safe vantage-ground. The replies to Mr. Hopkins show that. While still insisting that the doctrine of Christ's resurrection is to be accepted on faith, they nevertheless wander off into the uncertain field of evidence; and then, when they are met by a demand for evidence which in the nature of the case they cannot furnish, they retreat in confusion to the domain of faith. It is strange that they do not see where their true strength lies. The bodily resurrection of Jesus is so contrary to the laws of nature as we know them that, if it is to be decided by evidence at all, the evidence which can be adduced for it must be regarded as insufficient. This was the weak spot in most of the replies to Mr. Hopkins. In only one of them was there a frank recognition of the impossibility of proving the doctrine by conclusiv evidence, and the necessity, therefore, of resting it entirely on the authority of the divinely-commissioned Mother Church. As we have said, that is a position that cannot be assailed. God has spoken; the case is closed, no matter what the facts seem to show. By taking that stand the church may not be able in the future, as she has in the past, to silence the questioning spirit of man. But it is the only consistent attitude for her to take until she abandons the theory that all questions of historic fact in her creed must be accepted on the authority of a divine revelation, whether they are supported by evidence or not.—New York Tribune.

THE Friendship Liberal League, George Longford, secretary, meets at 7:30, every Sunday evening in Warner's Hall, Broad and Wallace streets, Philadelphia. Freethought publications are on sale at the meeting. Address, Sunday, July 7th, at 7:30 P.M., by F. G. Butler; subject, "Christianity vs. Secularism." All welcome. The afternoon meetings will be discontinued during July and August.

THE Women's Liberal League of Philadelphia meets at 8 o'clock Tuesday evenings in the Skerrett Building, N. E. corner of Ridge avenue and Green street. Admission free. All welcome.

News and Notes.

At last in Scotland, wonderful Scotland! the land of poetry and romance, where religion and whisky flow in equal quantities; where orthodoxy displays its most gloomy forms, and genius pours forth its sweetest gifts to mankind. My first point is Glasgow, and this city in itself is one of the greatest productions of modern times. The modern spirit is here displayed in superb achievement. In 1700 Glasgow was scarcely more than a village; now it has over 700,000 population, and is growing rapidly. It began with the tobacco and the sugar trade, thence branched into ship-building and manufactures, and has become the second city in the British empire, although it still finds a strong competitor in Liverpool. What has contributed most to the extraordinary growth of Glasgow is the river Clyde. This is perhaps the most remarkable river in the world, seeing that man himself has scooped it out and given it its majestic flow. Where once was a tiny stream that one could cross over a foot on a summer's day, now sweeps a deep course, twenty-four feet deep, upon which the largest ships of the world can float. No wonder the Glasgonian is proud of his river. It beats creation. An American, "once on a time," traveling along its tide and admiring its varied scenery, remarked that it wasn't much of a river after all; that there were far bigger ones in America. "But," answered the Glasgonian, "who made your rivers?" "God, I suppose," said the other. "Well," said the indomitable Scotsman, "God didn't make this river. We made it ourselves, and you can't show a river like this in all America." This is true. The river Clyde is unique in its pride and glory. God had nothing at all to do with it. While he was "resting" man was putting in his best licks, and creating a mighty and beautiful stream. And he has to keep at it; hundreds of barges and men are at work daily fighting the sea, keeping the depths clear and preserving the banks. Every stone is kept in its place. There is one thing, however, about the river Clyde that I can't recommend. It smells awful. The sewage of the city pours into it, and it is dirty and black, as if it flowed through hades itself. Of course, there is no escape from this at present, but efforts are being made to disinfect the stream, and make it as clean and non-perfumed as it is useful. As a matter of fact, however, the problem is a very difficult one, for the city must disgorge itself, and there is no other receptacle. But they who made the river will certainly sometime know how to purify it. Seeing they don't trust in God, there are hopes of success.

I arrive at Glasgow Friday evening, June 7th, and am met at the station by Mr. Gilmour, Mr. Forrester, and other Liberal friends of Glasgow. The day following, Saturday, is a wonderful day, full of resplendent and incomparable views from beginning to end. No wonder that Scotland boursgeons into poetry and romance when nature extends in such scenes of grandeur and loveliness. Under the guidance of Mr. Gilmour and Mr. Black, I journey from Glasgow to Inveraray. Mr. Black is a descendant of one of the Highland clans, and knows all about this legendary country. He has lived in it and is impregnated with its lurid and luminous history, and he could tell us many a tale as we swept along.

I leave Glasgow at 7:20 in the morning in the steamer Lord of the Isles. On either side the vast city looms and pours its smoke, and the tramp of industry is heard. Then broad fields open on the view, and far away the lofty mountains. We see the building of great ships. A thousand hammers ring forth upon the air. Ships are built here for all parts of the world, of every fashion and size. Some are of enormous bulk. We pass the greatest war cruiser now on the waters, The Terrible, of about 15,000 tons. It looks like a leviathan indeed, as it stretches along the wharf, massiv, like a mountain, yet able to skim the deep like a bird.

We glide slowly along at first, by Govan, then Renfrew, one of the oldest burghs in Scotland, from which the Prince of Wales takes the title of Baron of Renfrew; by Ellerslie House, at one time the abode of William Wallace, and Dunglass, the termination of the old Roman wall. Here also is the obelisk erected to the memory of Henry Bell, who was the first to apply steam power to water navigation. I must confess that I always thought that Fulton was ahead of the world, but it seems that he was not. America must yield the palm to Scotland. Bell launched his steamer, Comet, three horsepower, on the Clyde in 1812. Dumbarton Castle now comes in view, a hight of three hundred feet above the water—a picturesque and historic spot. It is said that the devil flung this mighty precipice after St. Patrick when he set sail for Ireland. There is a fort on it, at present, and a few pieces of artillery and some ancient weapons, among them formerly the two-handed sword of Wallace. After Dumbarton Castle we behold afar the peak of Ben Lomond, and then Cardross Castle appears where King Robert Bruce spent a few happy and peaceful days. Keeping on our course by Port Glasgow and Greenock we arrive at Dunoon. This is one of the most ancient settlements in the kingdom, and there are evidences of a Roman encampment here. On Castle Hill are the ruins of an old castle. We here take the coaches for a trip via Loch Eck. We travel along the shores of Holy Loch and the banks of the river Echaig, into the steep-sided glens of the Ben More range. Through the immense mountain scenery, unfolding miles away, we wind along to Loch Eck, a lovely sheet of water extending through the picturesque hills for seven miles. Here we take a boat and, with a merry company, sweep over its sparkling length. A glee company happen to be on board, and they sing while we dash onward amidst the enlivening prospects. We reach the head of the loch, where we again take coaches for Loch Fyne. From secluded scenes and rugged heights we ride among well cultivated farms, where modern improvements are seen. Near this route can be traced the line of ancient "duns," or forts, where it is told that the last stand was made against the tide of Roman conquest. At Loch Fyne we again go aboard the Lord of the Isles and voyage to Inveraray, the ancient capital town of Argyllshire. The castle of the Duke of Argyll is here, and there is only one street in the town. It has not a very flourishing appearance. The castle grounds, however, are very attractive. There are several objects of interest, among them a cross said to have been carried from Iona, the old parish church, etc. From Inveraray we make our return voyage by the Kyles of Bute. It is impossible to describe all that I witness on this tour. The Highlands of Scotland have their own peculiar beauty. They are not like the hills of Wales. The hills of Wales are like vast billows, sweeping away in majestic altitude, while the hills of Scotland are like breakers, sharp, precipitous, separate, each peak presenting a different aspect in its varying outline against the sky. The waters seem to flow in innumerable channels. They glitter in ever direction; now they flow in a narrow channel, then broaden to a vast river; then spread out like a lake of sea, surrounded by every variety of landscape. The heights are mostly barren. Only sheep can find anything to eat there. At their base, however, are elegant farms and farm-houses. Everything presents a clean and thrifty appearance. Wherever there is a chance for a green thing to grow, it grows. Little bits of cultivated soil gleam like jewels amidst the gray spaces. The mountains have a spick-and-span look, as if somebody swept and dusted them every morning. There is no "careless desolation" about them as in our own country. They have a habitable look even in their very bareness. All these varying shores have now become summer resorts. Villages are numerous, fine hotels and residences. The people of Glasgow take their "outing" in these splendid scenes. I catch a glimpse of the loch where Bradlaugh used to fish. He was very fond of fishing. It was a relief from toil and care. He would stick to it all day long, rain or shine. The fishermen still remember him as a wonderful man, genial, strong, ready, with a voice like a lion, and an arm like that of Wallace. With these hills and shining waters his memory will remain.

All the afternoon we speed along these radiant shores. A thousand objects attract the view, the adornments of art and the enchantments of nature. The shapes and dreams of the past possess us while the future unfolds its dancing colors. I could scarcely realize that Scotland hights look down on me, freighted with centuries of mingling life and death. In the golden evening hour we plow the busy Clyde, and the great city presents another aspect from that of the brilliant and sunny morn, with the banners of twilight floating over it. The twilights here are wonderfully long and beautiful. Not until ten o'clock or later do the golden hues fade away from the horizon, and when they do disappear from the dim vision, already the far-off faint lights of morn appear. Crowds are thronging the streets as we plunge again into the metropolis. It is Saturday night and all is gay and festive, preparatory, I suppose, to the "holy Sabbath." They have the habit here, as in the towns of England, and in London, some parts of it, of walking in the middle of the streets, the sidewalks are so thronged. I have not noted the like in any American city, not even in the narrow thoroughfares of Boston, where it would be a convenience. Here the crowds fill street and all; and I have got into the habit myself now of "keeping to the middle of the road."

Well, Sunday comes, a real Scottish Sunday, or Sabbath, and I have the pleasure of speaking to three fine audiences of Glasgow Liberals. In the evening especially there is an excellent attendance. I have a warm greeting, and I thoroughly enjoy the occasion. Mr. W. G. Unkles takes the chair in the morning and Mr. J. P. Gilmour in the afternoon and evening. In Scotland, as in England, I find an intense desire to hear Ingersoll. He would have an immense audience in Glasgow. Millions of copies of his lectures have been sold throughout these isles. No name evokes such enthusiasm as that of Ingersoll. The land of Burns would give him a royal welcome. The Glasgow Liberals believe in the good old Scottish doctrine of "the perseverance of the saints." They don't give up. They have kept the flag flying for many a year. They have splendid material, and are a power in the community. Of course Glasgow is a great church city, and the orthodox apparently rule. But still there is much of advanced thought even among the churches, especially in the Free church. There are two main Presbyterian churches in Scotland, the Free church and the Established church. The Established church will undoubtedly some day go, as it is now going in Wales. If left to the people of Scotland it would be disestablished at once. But the clergy of the Church of England are in the way, for they see that if the Established church of Scotland goes, although Presbyterian, the logic of events will make the Church of England go likewise. Some of the rigid orthodox have been endeavoring to expel Professor Drummond from the Free church. But it wouldn't do, notwithstanding the glaring fact that Professor Drummond has knocked the story of Adam and Eve higher than a kite. But the wise ones in the church have concluded to stand it.

I enjoyed Sunday afternoon the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. A. Forrester, who are staunch Liberals, and who have supported the cause for many years. The family are all Liberals, and I am indebted to them for many kindnesses.

Mr. George Gibson came over from Belfast, Ireland, to attend the lectures. I was in hopes to do some lecturing in Ireland, but probably shall not have the opportunity. There is a small society in Belfast, where lectures have been given by Foote, Forder, etc., but it is found pretty difficult to keep the movement at the front. However, our friends don't propose to stop work. There are brave Liberals in Ireland, notwithstanding the black shadow of the cross.

Mr. Gibson is a native of Ireland, has traveled all over it, and thoroughly understands its life and literature. He has fine linguistic attainments, and is a student of Latin, etc. He tells me that about 50,000 Irish speak the native language, and know no other. There is a paper published in the Irish language, which has a literature of a somewhat ancient date, but not of surpassing value; nothing in it of world-wide value. It is mainly local stories and legends of the past.

It was a great pleasure to meet Mr. Gibson. He is an enthusiastic and well-posted Liberal. He has read all our best books, and is in the ranks of THE TRUTH SEEKER. We can depend on him every time.

I have not finished with Glasgow yet, for I shall return there after my lecture at Edinburgh, June 16th, and visit the birthplace of Burns.

I leave Glasgow on Monday, June 10th, for Aberdeen, in the north of Scotland. I have a lovely day's ride, and in four hours and a half reach my destination. Aberdeen is a magnificent city of nearly 150,000 population. It is called "The Granite City." The Aberdeens think it the best and handsomest city in the world. I don't blame them. It struck me at first sight as one of the most massive and beautiful of cities. It is built entirely of granite, so far as I can see; no wood or brick anywhere. The stone is not gloomy, but of bright colors, and it presents to the eye not only solidity but brilliance. I lectured here last night to a full house, and had a lovely time, a glorious British cheer, and fair play. I shall have a good story to tell in my next of Aberdeen, of Dundee, of Edinburgh, and of Abbotsford and Melrose, haunted by the great Wizard of the North, the story-teller of the ages, who, next to Shakspeare and Homer, has given the past its most wondrous illuminations. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Bacon a Poet.

The Baconian authorship of the plays and poems of Shakspeare is scouted by the majority of the literary world. "Bacon was no poet," say many of them. What will they have to say when a lately discovered poem by Bacon is produced, which not only proves him a great poet but the veritable author of the plays, and of the cipher story now in course of publication in this country?

It is announced that a manuscript folio of some 500 pages, containing unpublished poems of Massinger and other authors, including a poem entitled "Farewell to Fortune," by Francis Bacon, has been found in the library of Trinity College, Dublin. "Fortune" is the first of the five key words to the cipher story discovered by Dr. Owen of Detroit. The poem is supposed to have been written after Bacon's misfortune in 1621, and it is said to borrow from the text of the tragedy of Henry VIII., one of the latest of the Shakspeare plays.

W. H. BURR.

Kansas and Moses Harman.

MR. EDITOR: I said my say in reference to this subject in the time now long ago, and have not felt like taking up the question again; but to day, as I read that an old and good man, Moses Harman, editor of Lucifer, the Light-bearer, is again in prison, I ask myself, What kind of people are these, the citizens of Kansas, that they have made it possible for such injustice to be administered once and again in the name of law? We are many of us old enough to remember what an effort was made to secure Kansas to the United States as a free state. Large numbers from the Eastern and Middle states became citizens of Kansas, and, outnumbering those from the South, the North conquered. I myself was jubilant. I am not proud of Kansas' inhabitants to-day. Are the children of Free State men and women less tyrannical, less oppressiv, than "Missouri ruffians?" Woman has spent much breath and some money in Kansas asserting her rights, but I have yet to learn that she in her societies has ever spoken in defense of the one man who has struck at the greatest wrong that woman suffers—the denial of her right to herself in marriage as well as out, and of the right to publish an account of her suffering, using the words necessary to make her meaning plain.

I am old and feeble. I have only an income that supplies me my bread. I cannot help the imprisoned editor with money; I cannot pray for him, for the powers that be are on the other side. I can only hope (against hope) that sometime there will come a change, and men and women will not oppress one another. Truly but not hopefully yours,
Syracuse, N. Y. LUCY N. COLMAN.

Piety per Order for Man-o'-Warsmen.

Having once been a seaman in the navy, I had an opportunity to observe the foolishness and utter uselessness of having a chaplain. I sailed from Boston in December, 1848, on the frigate Constitution, bound for the Mediterranean station. We had very rough weather sailing to the eastward across the Atlantic, as might be expected at that season of the year, so the chaplain did not show himself during the entire passage.

Upon our arrival at Tripoli the weather became quite agreeable, and on Sundays a temporary house of worship would be arranged by fixing capstan bars in shape for the blue-jackets to sit on while they listened to the reading of the sermon. The chaplain was of the Episcopalian faith, and therefore always read his discourse. It should be remembered that we were all compelled to attend "divine service." We had no choice but to obey orders and sit and listen to what the chaplain had to offer for our spiritual welfare—presumably. No matter whether the sailor was Jew or Gentile (and we had representatives of nearly every quarter of the globe and every faith, including idolaters), all were treated to the same sermon. The marines with their muskets stood at a parade rest on the quarter-deck, while the ship's band was near at hand and dispensed sacred music from time to time. This completed the panorama of compulsory worship. When the chaplain had finished his portion of the farce, we would be dismissed the same as though we had been mustered to witness punishment or hear the reading of the articles of war. J. H. Work and Perseverance Will Win.

When I removed to this neighborhood there was no other outspoken Freethinker nearer than St. Joseph, Mo., seven miles distant. I immediately went to work openly for human freedom, holding discussions with the preachers and the most confirmed orthodox. I procured Liberal newspapers, tracts, and pamphlets, distributing them freely among the reading ones, and now we have thirty who boldly announce themselves Infidels. We procured the school-house, gave out notices, and arranged to have P. V. Wise, of St. Joseph, give us a lecture. The attendance was good and included a large number of young people and women. They were very attentive and seemed well pleased.

It is strange that the people will pay their money to the preachers, who, like the Arkansas razor-back, are always squealing for more, claiming that they need it and other property for the gods. Poor, helpless gods! They are termed almighty, but they cannot create the temples for their own worship. They must have men, women, and children to go about begging, and even to hold strawberry and ice-cream festivals, to run lotteries, and to conduct all sorts of worldly schemes to build and furnish houses for these inhabitants of the skies.

The priests, finding that people prefer the parks, libraries, and places of amusement to their sleepy god-houses, are making an organized attack upon popular liberty by demanding the enactment and enforcement of cruel and tyrannous Sunday laws, which the Freethinkers of the United States must organize to resist. There is strength in union. We must organize and apply our means to the purposes of humanity. Of what use to us are gods, angels, and saints who cannot take care of themselves, and who can render no aid to humanity in such emergencies as the wrecking of the Elbe and Colima? If those who know that the Christian religion is untrue would cease contributing to its support, that system of fraud and falsehood would collapse within five years. W. S. PHILLIPS.

Sham Offerings to Demos.

In early stages of progress gods, conceived as man-like in so many other respects, are conceived as manlike in their credulity; deception being consequently practiced upon them. Sometimes in place of a human being an animal dressed up as a human being is immolated. Among the ancient Mexicans effigies of men were subject to sacrificial ceremonies like those to which actual men had been subject. The Chinese carry the system of sham offerings very far, making paper models of properties, utensils, and money, and burning them to propitiate the worshiped beings. And there are peoples among whom deceptions of this nature are practiced in the avowed belief that their gods are stupid. So that as the marauding Basuto expects by certain sounds to deceive the gods of the people he is robbing, so, in other cases, the semblance of an offering to a god is supposed to be mistaken by him for the reality.

What is the relevance of these facts? Well, I am reminded of them by observing how easily deluded is that many-headed god to whom in our day multitudinous sacrifices are made (especially of convictions), and before whom so much incense is burnt—the god Demos [People]. I was about to say, but remembering the restricted meaning of the word, let me say instead the apotheosized Public, whose fiat, uttered through its delegates, is thought to be a final criterion of good and evil, right and wrong. For this modern deity is deluded with scarcely less ease than the year-god of the Chinese is supposed to be deluded by paper offerings. Similarly lacking in discrimination, it does not distinguish between a semblance and a reality; and when the process of destroying the semblance has been gone through, it shows, by demonstrations of delight, that it thinks the reality has been destroyed.

A good illustration was furnished at the last meeting of the British Association by Lord Salisbury. Beginning his presidential address with the remark that he felt like "a colonel of volunteers" reviewing "an army corps at Aldershot," but shortly assuming the manner proper to a colonel of the guards reviewing the "awkward squad," he set forth what he professed to be the hypothesis of Natural Selection; and then, with an amusing simile, he thrust it through and, as it seemed to the on-looking public, let out its life-blood. Whereupon came through the press rounds of applause, and among readers much throwing up of caps and laughter at the fallacy detected; even comic verses, illustrative of the supposed absurdity, being published. Very curious it was to observe how a doctrine which Mr. Darwin had spent a life in elaborating, and which had been under examination and discussion by the whole biological world for a generation, was thought to be thus readily disposed of by a scholar's mate. Very curious, too, was it to observe the different effects produced in the world of science and in the outer world. Neither in the recent controversy between Dr. Wallace and Professor Henslow, nor in the criticisms of Mr. Bateson's late work, nor in the discussion before the Royal Society on Professor Weldon's experiments and views—all of them concerned with aspects of Natural Selection—is there the slightest sign that Lord Salisbury's attack had produced any impression whatever; a serene disregard showing that its irrelevance was tacitly recognized by all. Meanwhile the extreme improbability that there could be achieved so easy a triumph being overlooked, there was great rejoicing among those who stand by the old; even to the extent that a bishop and a dissenting minister were heard exchanging congratulations on what they supposed to be a defeat of the common enemy.—Herbert Spencer, in the Fortnightly Review.

The Father in the Library.

God is often spoken of as a parent, a father, especially when it is intended to signify the tenderness of the relation which is alleged to exist between him and his human creatures. Earthly parents love to give good gifts to their children; but it is said our "heavenly father" loves with an intensity and tenderness infinitely greater than theirs to give good gifts to us, to deal lovingly and tenderly by us. Is this true? Let us judge whether it is true or not by the most direct, natural, and simple test. The children are playing in the parlor. Father is in the library, the next room, only a closed door between them. Thomas suddenly asks: "Where is father?" Rufus replies: "In the library." "No, he is not," exclaim Henry and Susan, in a breath. "He is," reiterates Rufus. "He is not," rejoins Henry and Susan. "He is," "He is not," are bandied in gradually louder and angrier tones, which can be distinctly heard by their father in the library. Rufus becomes highly incensed, and strikes both Henry and Susan. They strike back. The mélée becomes general. Angry shouts, screams of pain, and the sound of blows reverberate through the house. Henry is finally killed outright. Susan is pushed against the hot stove, and dreadfully burned. An arm of Thomas is broken, and Rufus himself escapes only with injuries which will leave him a cripple for life. Father heard everything, knew what it was all about—a mere question as to whether he was in the library or not. He could end it all by merely putting his head out of the door, but he takes no notice of it, goes on with his reading or his writing. In fact, he created the conditions on purpose to set his children to quarreling and fighting. Does such a father love to deal tenderly by his children?

The disputes as to the existence, the whereabouts, the attributes, of God have been going on for ages. Wordy controversy was long ago succeeded by blows. The din of the conflict of arms in this quarrel has resounded in every quarter of the world, neither age nor sex has been regarded. The victims who have fallen beneath the sword, the spear, the battle-axe, have been fortunate, indeed, over those who have languished in dungeons and chains, have been broken on the wheel, stretched upon the rack, or, chained to the stake, have from the midst of flame furnished a spectacle to their persecutors. On one side a spirit has been evoked to inflict the worst, on the other to brave the worst, which could be inflicted, and so the maximum of wretchedness has been attained. Of course, "our heavenly father" has seen and heard all, has known from the beginning what it was all about, could have ended it all at any stage, at once, at his pleasure, by proof, open, plain, indisputable, that could have been seen and known of all. But no; if he is in the library, he has remained silent, unmoved, occupied. Occupied? In the infliction of these very evils, in egging on the parties to these quarrels and cruelties. Is it not admitted, as logically it must be, that they could not happen without his "providence?"—John Francis Smith, in "Is the Universe Governed by a Devil?"

The Ascension Myth.

Much has been written of late touching the resurrection of the physical body of Christ, but nothing has been said as to his ascension, though the latter is surely a corollary of the former.

The teaching of the Christian church is that the risen body of Jesus, after a certain period, ascended into heaven, yet many people, even among those who read the Bible constantly, may be surprised to learn that there is in the four gospels only the smallest foundation for this belief. Matthew and John, who, being apostles, ought assuredly to have known more about it than the other evangelists, make no allusion to the event. This may also be said of Mark, for, as is now well known, his gospel originally terminated at the eighth verse of the last chapter, the remaining twelve having been added by a later writer. A marginal note opposite verse 9 in the revised version of the New Testament states that the concluding verses are not to be found in the oldest Greek manuscripts. There remains, therefore, only Luke, who was not an eye-witness, as Matthew and John must have been, but who writes (xxiv, 51), "He was parted from them [the apostles] and carried up into heaven." Yet here again there is a significant marginal note in the revised version to the effect that "some ancient authorities omit 'and was carried up into heaven.'"

Of course I am aware that elsewhere in the New Testament there are allusions to the ascension of Christ, particularly in the Acts (presumably written by Luke), but why is it that Matthew and John, actual eye-witnesses, according to Luke, avoid all mention of it?—Bible Student, in the New York Sun.

Observations.

The more books on words and their uses the better, provided the writers have an understanding of the subject and the reader is apprised that he is at liberty to use his own judgment about approving their criticisms. Perhaps without knowing that a part of his title had already been appropriated by Bardeen, author of "Verbal Pitfalls," Mr. J. Fitzgerald, the founder and former proprietor of the Humboldt Library of Science, has put forth a little work called "Pitfalls in English," which has much to commend it. There are between its covers 175 paragraphs directing attention to important facts to be recognized by writers of English. The author's experience as a reviser of "copy" for printers has qualified him for his task, and his book would speak for itself even though he had not spoken so strongly for it in his preface. "This little volume," he says, "is the work of no tiro;" for "during the first four years of the Forum he revised in the manuscript every article but three published in that periodical, and alone bore the responsibility for their grammatical and stylistic redaction." I would rather be responsible for the "stylistic redaction" of an article than for the phrase wherewith Mr. Fitzgerald describes that process, for "stylistically redactionize" would be sure to accompany it. Moreover, after an article shall have been so treated, I doubt if one can truthfully say that it has been more than competently revised. Mr. Fitzgerald speaks also of "a typist's error," but he does not tell us what a typist has the peculiarity to be. Its position in the text suggests that typist may stand for type-writer—not the machine, but the operator—in fact, a copier. I would appeal to Mr. Fitzgerald and others with knowledge and authority to help rid the language of these hissing ists, instead of introducing more of them. He may say that "type" is from the Greek, and that it therefore demands the suffix he gives it, but photograph and the other graphs change form conveniently enough by the addition of er, and their roots are in the Greek, I am told. "Pitfalls in English" has an instructive chapter on the German and English vocabularies, in which the structure of the two languages is shown, to the dispraise of our mother tongue. But the poor exhibit made by English is not apparently referable to any natural defect; the word-coiners, who like to show us that they have been abroad, have imported those particular faults of the language that render it inferior to German. And so books like Mr. Fitzgerald's have to be written as much to preserve the Anglo-Saxon as to explain the outland words and combinations that have made us forget it.

The Rev. J. J. Porter is a Baptist preacher. He is also the editor of The Helper, published in Jerseyville, Ill., and professes to be eager for a debate with "any living Infidel scholar [dead ones being barred] as to the correctness of the Bible." Here is a sample of what the Rev. Mr. Porter can do:

THOMAS PAINE.

In 1792 he [Paine] went to Paris to engage in constitution-making with Condorcet. Soon he was imprisoned by Robespierre, and during the eleven months of his imprisonment he wrote the "Age of Reason." He showed it to Dr. Franklin, who returned it, advising Paine never to publish it, but burn it up before it was seen by any other person, and thus he would save himself a great deal of repentance and mortification.

The facts, as recorded by Mr. Paine himself, are that the first part of the "Age of Reason" was written in 1793, being completed in December of that year, six hours before the author's arrest took place. Franklin had then been dead about three years. I do not believe that the Rev. Mr. Porter desires to debate with Infidels on the "correctness" of anything. What he wants is a lying-match.

On suicide, the Christian Advocate says: "The responsible person who takes his own life is, in the light of Christianity and Christian teaching, a murderer. He rushes unbidden into the presence of God." The statement stimulates thought. In the first place, as Colonel Ingersoll has remarked, they tell us that God is everywhere, and that it is a sin to rush into his presence. No doubt, etiquette demands that anyone about to wait on the Almighty shall send his card ahead of him, the same as when he calls upon Mayor Strong of this city. But, conceding that those who say that God is everywhere have mislocated him, and that he is actually in a place called heaven, we may well ask whether murderers are admitted to those precincts. Probably not; and so, probably, instead of the suicide rushing into the presence of God he in reality rushes into his absence.

"Tacoma: A $500 Prize Essay," is before me. The author, Mr. F. R. Wall, in speaking of the rise of the City of Destiny, says: "One would be tempted to call this growth phenomenal, except that it is the direct outcome of known laws." No, he would not, my friend, provided he knew the meaning of the words he was using. All growth is phenomenal, and the fact that Tacoma is "the direct outcome of known laws" proves that it is no exception to the rule. If it were otherwise it would be miraculous, or at the least marvelous. The phenomenal is often commonplace.

That there is a basis of probability for the hypothesis of heredity influence few would be rash enough to deny, but it is not strengthening under the advocacy of some of its expositors. Like other branches of science in the hands of unscientific persons, it is in danger of becoming a fad. As an illustration, Lady Henry Somerset, the moral crusader, recently attempted in a magazine article to account for the unbelief of Robert G. Ingersoll on the grounds of heredity, in doing which she invented a story somewhat as follows: Ingersoll's father was a Calvinist preacher; while his mother, being tender hearted, revolted at the cruelty of that creed. On a visit to a friend, during Robert's prenatal life, she found the writings of Voltaire, which fascinated her, and as a result the boy was born an unbeliever. Further developing her system of mythology, Lady Somerset relates that when a cousin of Ingersoll told him about her Christian faith, Robert said, "while tears rolled down his cheeks," "I would give all I have, my cousin, if I could believe as you do, but I cannot." Mrs. Somerset leaves it to be inferred that the subject's doubt of the Christian system is not the result of thought, but is due to the remorseless grip of heredity. Her theory, however, is lacking in one important element—namely, it is not based upon facts. The touching incident of the female cousin is said by the Colonel to be untrue, and he also declares that, to the best of his belief, his mother never saw the works of Voltaire. Poor heredity! It is faring almost as badly as "science" since the faith-healers got hold of it, called themselves Christian scientists, and became the only "scientists" in the world.

Spelling reform, such as the dropping of the final e, is not the innovation some have been led to suppose. In 1667 a man named Sprat, author of a "History of the Royal Society," London, wrote ap-plaus, because, examin, rais, and tru. He also spelled owe "ow." At about the same time, if not earlier, the wife of a clergyman, addressing a letter to her absent spouse, subscribed herself "Your loving yf."

The thirteenth chapter of the gospel according to St. John has an account of a supper at which Jesus Christ entertained his disciples. The same relates that when he had eaten all he wanted, or all there was in sight, he laid aside his clothes, took a towel and girded himself, and proceeded forthwith to wash the feet of the brethren. Two customs of considerable antiquity are supposed to have their origin in the proceedings of this occasion, one being the communion and the other the washing of feet as a religious ceremony. Now another feature of the evening is found to have had a theological significance, namely, the removal of the clothes. And why not? The master of ceremonies evidently had some reason for appearing in the nude, and whatever it was, those who cannot understand may at least imitate, as they do in many other instances. Hence it occurs that in Omaha, Neb., a sect has arisen which, while retaining the communion and pedobaptism, has added thereto the bath in the altogether. The New Testament account does not tell whether or not ladies were present at the doings described, but the Omaha sect takes it for granted that they were, and so the brethren and sisters worship together like Adam and Eve, and profess not to be ashamed to do so. Their rites consist of a bath, after which the souls of the worshipers repose together and drink in the love of God, as a devotee describes it to the newspaper men. A peculiar theory of this sect is that the love of God emanates from neither the heart nor the brain, but has its rise in the bowels and in the adjacent organs of continuity; and they hold that as brethren and sisters should bear testimony openly to what God has done for them, the nude exhibition and contact become a divine command. There is any amount of scripture to be quoted in support of the practice—twice as much as there is for some religious observances that are enforced by law—Sunday-keeping, for example, which is almost entirely destitute of biblical authority. In the first place, the only perfect beings the creator ever had the kindness to locate on this sphere were habituated to nudity all the time they were perfect, and it is plain enough that if any would become like them the first necessity is to strip. Again, when David blessed his household, he wore no clothes. Likewise Saul, when the spirit of God came upon him, "stripped off his clothes," as the inspired book puts it, and did not resume them for twenty-four hours. Micah, too, believed that by discarding the habiliments of civilization he could appease the divine wrath, and Isaiah walked naked and barefoot for years. Woman had not enough influence in Bible times to affect the destiny of the universe by anything she could do of her own motion, still, if Bathsheba had kept her bloomers on there would have been no savior along the line of David. Passing thence to Solomon, observe the language of his Song. True, there is no doubt (ohellno) that here we have Christ addressing his bride, the Church, and the church responding, but at the same time their descriptions of each other are so minute and circumstantial that we know at once that their observations were not impeded by conventional attire.

The doctrines of this new sect are especially adapted to the purposes of seaside and arboreal camp-meetings, and also to the warmer latitudes, where its missionaries would find the timber peeled ready to hand.
GEO. E. MACDONALD.

Thomas Henry Huxley.

By the death of Professor Huxley the scientific and Freethought world is deprived of the services of one of the best-equipped and most courageous exponents of truth and teachers of the people. His command of the English language was excellent, and it is doubtful if he had more than two or three superiors in this respect. And this counts for much, for of what avail are sound arguments and sound expositions if they are not understood by those to whom they are addressed? Huxley was understood, and this explains why the clergy and the lay defenders of the old theological conceptions of the universe were always so eager to try to break the force of his reasonings and dispute his facts. They knew that his readers understood what he wrote and that his utterances would not fail to weaken the position of the church apologists. Of his style and his intellectual armament, the New York Herald well says:

He had a literary culture, a sense of form, and a consequent facility of expression that were denied to Darwin and to Tyndall. Among all modern scientists Spencer alone equals him as a master of style. But Huxley, in addition, possessed an extraordinary perspicuity as well as simplicity of phrase, which attracted to him the non-scientific as well as the scientific mind, the non-literary as well as the literary public.

For mere rhetoric, for polish of expression, for structural harmony, for keen wit and sarcasm, masked under the most graceful urbanity; for unsparring logic and for luminous simplicity, even when dealing with the most abstruse and difficult subjects, the books which Huxley addressed to the unscientific world—such books, for instance, as his "Lay Sermons," his "Evolution and Ethics," and his "Christianity and Agnosticism"—are almost unparalleled in English literature. On the other hand, the results of his severe studies in vertebrate morphology, in paleontology, in ethnology, and in all branches of biology, show the breadth of his mind and the accuracy of his deductions.

Thomas Henry Huxley was born May 4, 1825, at Ealing, England. He received his education at the Ealing school, in which his father was a teacher. When seventeen years of age he went to Charing Cross Medical School, where he remained three years, graduating as bachelor of medicine. He stood second in his class in anatomy and physiology. He began to write when a student, contributing to the Medical Times and Gazette a paper on the external layer of cells on the root of the hair. This is now called the "sheath of Huxley." He entered the naval service in 1846, shipping as assistant surgeon in Captain Stanley's expedition to the South Pacific, going out on the Rattlesnake. The cruise occupied four years. During this trip he studied the lower marine life and sent home several communications relating to his investigations. He was made a fellow of the Royal Society in 1851. Of his career to 1872 the World gives this condensed sketch:

He resigned his position in the navy and in 1854 succeeded Prof. Edward Forbes as professor of natural history in the Royal School of Mines in Jermyn street, London. From 1863 to 1869 he was Hunterian professor in the Royal College of Surgeons, and was twice chosen Fullerian professor of physiology in the Royal Institution. In 1869 and 1870 he was president both of the Geological Society and the Ethnological Society. In 1870 he was president of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, and in 1872 he became secretary of the Royal Society.

In 1870 and subsequently he was a member of the Royal Commission on Scientific Instruction and the Advancement of Science, and also served on the London

Schoolboard, being chairman of the committee which formed the scheme of education adopted in the board schools. In 1872 he was made Lord Rector of the University of Aberdeen.

Professor Huxley spent seven weeks in the United States in 1876, lecturing on science and education. His lecture at Johns Hopkins University greatly excited the clergy, who declared that his discourses were conducive to the spread of Atheism and Materialism, which was no doubt true. In New York he gave three lectures on the direct evidence of evolution, illustrating them and deducing the data for his argument from the then recent discoveries made by Professor Marsh in the miocene beds of Wyoming.

"On the Physical Basis of Life," "Lay Sermons, Addresses, and Reviews," "Critiques and Addresses," "Elementary Physiology," "Science and Hebrew Tradition," "Science and Christian Tradition," "Man's Place in Nature," and "Science and Education," are among Professor Huxley's very numerous works and volumes of essays.

Mr. Huxley was neither a pessimist nor an optimist, holding, rather, to the view of the meliorists. Speaking of this trait of his intellect, the New York Tribune remarks:

He disagreed as frankly with those who thought they traced moral results from cosmical causes as he did with those who defended miracles. "Let us understand once for all," he said on one occasion, "that the ethical progress of society depends, not on imitating the cosmic process, still less in running away from it, but in combating it. The theory of evolution encourages no millennial anticipations. If for millions of years our globe has taken the upward road, yet sometime the summit will be reached, and the downward route will be commenced. The most daring imagination will hardly venture upon the suggestion that the power and intelligence of man can ever arrest the precession of the great year."

This is another evidence that his mind was singularly free from the tendency to cherish delusions and to be deceived by time-honored catchwords.

Something has been gained for freedom of expression when of such an antagonist of the church as Huxley the popularity-seeking newspapers can say what many of them have said of the dead scientific inquirer and Liberal controversialist; and who can doubt that he has himself done much to make it possible for these kindly and appreciative words to be said of him, by opening the eyes of the people to the fact that the church does not hold a patent to all the truth and nobility in the world? In its editorial tribute, the Tribune remarks:

Huxley was unique. His place in the scientific world was such as no other man of his time could fill, or attempted to fill. He was in company with Darwin, Tyndall, Spencer, Haeckel, Pasteur, and other illustrious men, now living or dead, but from them all he stood in a measure apart. Great, perhaps, as the greatest, he differed from them all so widely as to baffle comparison and to demand consideration alone, judged only by himself and his own achievements. The supreme quality of his beneficence was this, that he was ready to deal with any subject of human interest that might come up for profitable consideration, and able to do so with illuminating power and convincing authority. He studied, spoke, and wrote on many themes, but all to good purpose. In some of his brief fugitive essays and letters are to be found contributions of the highest value to current thought and to abiding knowledge. He once expressed a certain amiable contempt for autobiographies, as inevitably works of imaginative fiction. But those who knew him, and who know his works best, will admit that in one of his utterances he sketched his own character, though perhaps unintentionally and unconsciously, with faithful and consummate skill.

"That man," said he, "has a liberal education who has been so trained in youth that his body is the ready servant of his will, and does with ease and pleasure all the work that, as a mechanism, it is capable of; whose intellect is a clear, cold logic-engine, with all its parts of equal strength and in smooth working order, ready, like a steam-engine, to be turned to any kind of work, and spin the gossamers as well as forge the anchors of the mind; whose mind is stored with a knowledge of the great and fundamental truths of nature and of the laws of her operations; one who, no stunted ascetic, is full of life and fire, but whose passions are trained to come to halt by a vigorous will, the servant of a tender conscience; who has learned to love all beauty, whether of nature or of art, to hate all villainess, and to respect others as himself. Such a one, and no other, has had a liberal education." The world can add no higher and no more richly merited tribute to the author of those noble words than this, that such a man was Thomas Henry Huxley.

The New York World is not less warm in its appreciation:

Science to him meant simple truth, and he was persuaded that the plain people were capable of understanding simple truth and profiting by it. He did not think it necessary in his lectures to workingmen to present truth in any startling way. He dealt with them with as much of candor and simplicity as he brought to bear in his work as a professor or his learned deliverances before the great scientific societies. It was his mission and his impulse to strip science of her mysteries and exhibit her as truth pure and simple.

He was admirably adapted by temperament and education to this task. He was not fettered by the traditions of the schools. He was a graduate of no college or university. Two or three years in school were all he had of systematic instruction before he began the study of medicine. Yet throughout his long life there was no man in Europe more honored by the universities, none whom they more eagerly besought to teach with their authority,

His mind was always open, fearless, and receptive. He was in love with truth, and at no point did the truth have any sort of terror for him.

His love of truth and his championship of it extended far beyond the domain of the physical sciences. He was a polemic writer of tremendous force and extraordinary influence. He attacked myths as fearlessly as he dissected crayfish, and in a like spirit. He did not fear to break lances with the bishops and other clergy in their own field of learning. The English-speaking world owes more to him than to any one man of our time, perhaps, for its liberation from the restraining bonds of tradition and superstition.

There are many more like testimonials to the mental strength, the moral earnestness, and the frank fearlessness of the leader now gone from us, but we have room for no more here. May his example stimulate the young of both sexes, and help them to help free the world from superstition and tyranny.

It Was a "Slip."

May I be permitted to say a few words concerning a difference of opinion that appears to have arisen between THE TRUTH SEEKER and the American Sentinel, the usually clear-thinking newspaper representative of the Seventh-Day Adventists? A brief statement of the question at issue is first necessary: J. Q. Allison, of Douglassville, Ga., was arrested and tried for "Sabbath-breaking." In answer to an argument made by the Adventist prisoner, the judge said:

I would not interfere with you in any way in the enjoyment of your religion; this is simply a law of the state, and we are bound thereby. The state could say that you should keep Wednesday or Thursday, or every other Thursday, that it would be a crime to work on every other Wednesday or every other Thursday, and we would be bound to obey the law.

Commenting on this, the Sentinel remarks, among other things:

This statement by the judge would be true if the law were indeed a merely civil regulation based upon civil reasons.

Following this the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER stated that the Sentinel showed conclusively that the Sabbath law is not based on merely civil reasons, and thus disposed of the judge's special plea, but added that the Adventist editor's admission that the state has the right to make honest labor a crime on any day for any reason is unconditional surrender. In its issue of June 27th the Sentinel denies that it has surrendered a vital principle or any principle, and avers that THE TRUTH SEEKER overlooked the if in its statement. It declares that "it has many times proved that there is, and can be, no civil reason for enforced weekly rest." It also calls attention to another sentence in the paragraph which THE TRUTH SEEKER criticised: "No other reason could possibly exist for forbidding a man to plow in his own field on Sunday." In its reply to you it further says:

It follows that there could be no civil reason for prohibiting honest labor upon any day, for if there could, that reason could apply to Sunday as well as to any other day. The fact that after years of diligent search no such reason has been found, proves that it does not exist. The Sentinel has made no surrender, either unconditional or otherwise, for the Sentinel supposes no unsupportable case. The position of the Sentinel is and always has been that a weekly day of rest can exist only on a religious basis and for religious reasons, that therefore the state could, of right, have nothing whatever to do with the question, and that all so-called civil reasons are mere figments invented for the purpose of evading constitutional guarantees of freedom of conscience.

I am much surprised at Mr. Bollman's lack of perspicacity in this instance. While it is without doubt true that the so-called civil reasons are "mere figments invented for the purpose of evading constitutional guarantees of freedom of conscience," so far as the Sabbatarian leaders are concerned, it is equally true that those alleged reasons are real reasons to a good many friends of Sunday laws, who imagine that the state has the right to do anything that the majority demands, and it is an entirely supposable case that the majority might demand that the first day of the week or some other day be set aside as a day of enforced rest; and it is against this very possible danger that I now wish to arouse the Adventists' fighting spirit. To illustrate what I mean I would call the Sentinel's attention to the fact that the Illinois legislature at its last regular session decreed that henceforth all barber shops in that state be closed on Sunday, and Altgeld permitted it to become a law. He was too much of a demagog to either veto it or sign it; the Barbers' Association had demanded the law, in the selfish interest of those who did not themselves wish to work on Sunday and were determined that if they shut their shops the other barbers, those who did wish to work, should not be permitted to open. Of course religious reasons influenced some who voted for the bill and more who worked for it, but they had little to do with the demand of the barbers and nothing to do with Altgeld's inaction that permitted the nefarious measure to become law. The Sentinel overlooks the vitally important fact that the civil reasons advanced in favor of the denial of the liberty of the citizen on Sunday or on other days do not have to be valid reasons to make them operative on the minds of the majority. Mr. Bollman says that no other than a religious reason "could possibly exist for forbidding a man to plow in his own field on Sunday." But that would not be a valid reason, yet it would be as valid as many other alleged reasons. It should be remembered that we are not dealing with sound reasons for tyranny, but with excuses, and "rest," "physiology," and similar ones may be as effective catch-words as "sacred" or "god-appointed." Mr. Bollman does not believe that the state should compel him, on religious grounds, to rest when he does not want to rest; but suppose that the state, in the name of hygiene or of the other man, orders him to rest when he does not want to rest, by making Wednesday a universal rest day—will he agree with the Georgia judge that it would be a crime to work on this civil rest day, and that the good citizen should obey the law?

This brings me to the Sentinel's assertion that "there can be no civil reason for prohibiting honest labor upon any day." Nevertheless, it is done. Take, for instance, the law of this state, which compels the saloon to close at 1 A. M. But perhaps the Sentinel would demur to classing the saloon business as "honest" labor. Very well, my case does not depend upon proving that it is. But what of the laws that forbid children under a certain age to do honest work in factories and elsewhere? What of the law of this state that enables the meddler Gerry to prevent children eager to take part in stage performances from doing so? What of the law that in most states shuts women out from doing work at the ballot-box and in official positions? And, finally, what of the ten-hour and eight-hour laws that make honest labor an offense after a certain minute of each day?

The dilemma that the Georgia judge presented to our Adventist friends still confronts them—and all of us.

E. C. WALKER.

A Note from Mr. Fleckten.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER—Sir: I have seen the report from Mr. E. Steenerson, of Crookston, Minn., as to the school fight in my district, and also your remarks upon the matter, in response to which I send you $10—$5 from myself and $3 from A. Betzen, W. Fleckten, and John Fleckten, for the school fund; the balance to be applied on my subscription to your paper. I will also pledge an additional $5 for the fund.

I inclose a sketch of the school-house in District No. 61, the scene of this contest. The house was built after my own plans, though I had some difficulty in getting it to suit me. I think there is not another like it in the state. It cost $1,000. When I was school clerk the American flag floated above the building, but it has been taken down, and the so-called "Holy Bible" is used as a text-book instead. I also, while clerk, succeeded in establishing a school library, costing $100 and containing encyclopedias, United States histories, and other useful books. At the same time I held trustees and treasurer to strict account for funds passing through their hands, the latter officer being dismissed for irregularity. As a consequence I, a single Freethinker, had to contend against a whole school district; but I have succeeded up to this Bible-reading fight, which brought everyone against me, women and all. That is the reason why I have to ask for help. Thanking you very heartily for your able service in the case, I am, Yours truly, Kandiyohi, Minn.

Last Chance to Obtain a Rare Book.

David Friedrich Strauss's "Life of Jesus Critically Examined" was first published in two volumes for $9. The edition ran out, and another was issued in one volume for $4.50. This edition is almost exhausted, less than fifty copies being in existence. Of what are left we have obtained a share, and can furnish them postpaid at the last price, $4.50. They will not last long, and we advise those of our friends who want a copy to send at once. When these are gone there will be no more to be had. This edition is translated from the fourth German edition by George Eliot, and contains 784 large octavo pages of solid reading, very clearly printed. It is unnecessary to say to students that this is a very valuable work, one which the church wishes had never been written, but which it cannot controvert.

ROCKERVILLE, S. DAK., June 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, for which please extend my time to THE TRUTH SEEKER one year. I am loaning my papers to my friends, and they expect to subscribe just as soon as they can get the money to spare. Times are pretty hard just now.

I could not get along without the paper now, hardly, so please let the good work go on and give them the truth.

H. M. MACY.

ST. JACOBS, ILL., June 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: As a friend of Freethought and reform, an admirer of kind and honest men and women, citizens of principle, a lover of liberty, and an enemy of hypocrisy, I inclose $6. For $3 please send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year and the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" to C. J. Maurer. For the other $3, send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year to Mr. John Stevenson, and the premium offer—"Bell's Hand-Book of Freethought," direct to my address. The above named persons are new subscribers, and I feel that there will soon be more in our community. Looking upon all good men as neighbors and brothers, may THE TRUTH SEEKER's work for goodness and freedom be that of steadfast loyalty.

Yours for reason, justice, and the liberty of speech,

SCOTTSDALE, ARK., June 8, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER and "Dynamic Theology," and "All About the Holy Bible" and "The Great Ingersoll Controversy." I have thought for quite a while that I would have to pay up and stop my paper, the dear old TRUTH SEEKER, but "kind providence" always provides for the faithful. It is said that you can't hurt a Christian. If I were able, I would take a copy of every book and pamphlet that you publish. My best wishes for all Freethinkers, wherever dispersed, even including Watson Heston. Yours for the truth, Franklin Steiner Corrected.

LAKOTA, N. D., June 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In Mr. Steiner's letter in last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER he stated, in error, that F. A. Rahders was a graduate of Trinity College, Durham. I wish to correct same. I am not a graduate of Trinity College, Durham.

Very respectfully, F. A. RAHDEES.

Does Not Dote on Deacons.

EAREHAM, IA., June 3, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Your excellent paper is a welcome weekly visitor. I would not exchange it for any paper I ever read. I am a Freethinker, and abhor the Bible and its teachings. Don't love Bible-pounders, nor do I dote on deacons. Am twenty-eight years old; have three little ones whom I will teach the truth. It has been my misfortune to always dwell in a church-ridden community, hence have few friends. It seems strange to me that women defend the Bible, support the clergy, and are slaves to religion, when it has always been a curse to their sex. If some of those old saints lived now there would be numerous lynchings. I read the Letters of Friends with pleasure, but am sorry to see so few women in the ranks of Freethought.

Yours for freedom,

MRS. GEO. B. FOX.

To Organize in Omaha.

OMAHA, NEB., June 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The meeting was called to order at 2:30 P. M., in the hall at 1315 Douglas street. Mr. McArdle, in an informal manner, nominated Judge Bartlett for chairman and Mr. Biglow for secretary. They were elected. The Nine Demands of Liberalism were now read by Mr. Victor. Mr. Emery made some interesting remarks, and Mr. Victor outlined the objects of the meeting, and explained the Nine Demands. Further remarks were made by Messrs. Emery and McArdle and the chair. The Nine Demands were accepted with but one dissenting vote.

The election of officers was postponed for a week, and the committee on resolutions appointed, to report in one week. An interesting talk followed. It was moved that Brother Victor be appointed treasurer pro tem. (carried). PAUL L. BIGLOW.

Bible in the Schools.

DISCO, MICH., June 24, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The Bible is shut out of our school here for the present, and, I am proud to say, it was through my instrumentality as one of the trustees, but the end is not yet, for the pious ones are laying for me at the next election when my time expires. If they can elect a member from their side in my place (and I am afraid they will), they can reinstate the Bible, and that is their plan, and also to boycott me in business and crucify me on the altar of their wrath. But I shall still oppose the use of any Bible in the schools as long as I am a tax-payer for the support of the same.

FRANCIS R. PAYNE.

[Among the other guarantees of religious freedom in the constitution of Michigan is a provision in Art. IV., Sec. 39, that no person shall be compelled to "attend, erect, or support any place of religious worship, or to pay tithes, taxes, or other rates for the support of any minister of the gospel or teacher of religion." This prevents the use of the school-house as a place of worship, and forbids the teacher to inculcate religion.—ED. T. S.]

Here and There a Ray of Light.

SANTA CRUZ, CAL., June 4, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1.50 for the "Cosmian Hymn-Book." About three months ago we organized here the Santa Cruz Secular Union. It is founded upon the principles of the Freethought Federation of America. We have our meetings every Sunday night at Odd Fellows' hall, and it is very gratifying to see so many intelligent people at our meetings. We always have a good program, some speaking and reading, with discussion following to separate truth from falsehood, and, as our president is a teacher in music and song, and many of the lady members are good piano players and singers, it is not very difficult to have fine music and song at each session. Last Sunday we had the first grand Freethought picnic ever held in Santa Cruz county. The day was a delightful one, and everybody was happy. Too much cannot be said in praise of our good and generous lady friends who helped to make the affair a grand success. Then there were a number of our German friends who gave us good music and songs. The Turners are so whole-souled, splendid fellows, and to all of them we feel grateful. So you see the world is growing wiser and stronger as it grows older. The anti-naturalists cannot suppress Sunday picnics any more than they can stop the activity of nature itself. Anti-naturalism is surely and steadily crumbling away. Freethought is rapidly dispersing the black clouds of the fanatical Sunday-closing bigotry, and it will yet fill the world with light, love, and beauty.

Yours ever, VICTOR LAINE.

With Face to the East.

NANTICOKE, June 19, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I send you $1 for the next four months, as I am thinking about returning to my native country, to settle for the rest of life. My wife has not been well since the last winter set in, and she wants to go home to live out the rest of our time, as her health has not been good in this country at any time; so we have concluded we will return to the land of our fathers, to take our last rest among them, though it matters not where we take up our last abode, or sleep the future in silence, for when the change comes there is no escape, neither for pope nor emperor, bishop nor king.

Well, I am proud of the efforts you are making for the cause of free inquiry, and must say you are one of its most fearless champions. Go on; all lovers of truth and right must admire your work, and will respect you in the fearlessness of doing it. I know there is much yet to do, but, as the Scotch proverb says, "Many a mickle mak's a muckle," and as Burns sings:

"Come it shall, for a' that,
That sense and worth o'er a' the earth
Shall bear the gree, an' a' that."

I daresay a friend of mine will be writing you and giving an order for THE TRUTH SEEKER; so he tells me. I may further say I have tried to get several others to become subscribers, but the church is a great institution here; still there is a break in the cloud, and let us hope the ray of light will shine through in time.

JAMES YATES.

Infers There Will Be No Lack of Cranks.

CHARLEVOIX, MICH., June 16, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I was about to address you as E. M. McDonald, when your little article on the inaccuracy of such men as the editors of Infidel papers flashed on my mind. Now, if such men make such mistakes, what can be expected of us uneducated backwoodsmen? In fact, the difference between the Mc and Mac is a sort of poser to many of us? We have a resident here that was born and reared in the land o' cakes, and he pronounced it Muck Doonal. [That is near enough to the pronunciation we were taught to give it.—ED. T. S.] I cannot say how he spells it, and, in fact, I care not whether it is Mc, Mac, or Muck, so long as the grand old TRUTH SEEKER keeps rattling along at an increased and improved rate of speed. I took many annual trips on the grand old train while D. M. Bennett was engineer, and thought then that it was well managed, but I must say, and that without any intent to flatter, that the present engineer seems to hold a masterly grip on the throttle, steadying the motion over the rough places, and making each run more interesting for the passengers. In the News and Notes from England we have that which almost makes us wish that we were English, don'tcherknow. In the Observations and Letters of Friends we have that which assures us that this nation will never lack for a crank to drive its machinery. Now, from such a well-equipped train I would hate to be pushed off when it reaches our station, because of the expiration of the life of my pass (which is not a preacher's), and seeing said pass soon expires, I herewith send for renewal. Wishing all who have control of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER train and their many passengers long life and prosperity, I am, Yours for truth, genuine liberty, justice, and equal rights, ROBT. MILLER.

Criticises Mr. Spencer's "Non-related Absolute."

CHICAGO, ILL., June 19, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I think I am indebted to you yet to the extent of twenty-five cents, which I will pay surely this time, and no mistake. I do not like to owe anyone even so small a sum as twenty-five cents. For the balance of the money kindly send me Colonel Ingersoll's "Gods and Other Lectures," also "The Vicar of Savoy," by J. J. Rousseau; also send me a duplicate of THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 1st, as mine was taken from my desk before I had a chance to read it. I always feel as if I missed something by not having read that number. The picture on the front page was magnificent. I was thinking of getting an enlarged crayon copied from it. My friend, Mr. U. H. Maple, comes in two or three times a week to read THE TRUTH SEEKER and discuss the articles therein. Mr. Maple is one of those men who have long, deep thoughts which penetrate an article or book to its very soul, you might say. He is the author of "No Beginning, or the Fundamental Fallacy," which is a masterpiece, and the thought in it is original with him. The second edition will be out in a few months. Mr. Maple is now writing an appendix explaining himself more fully on the position he takes against the non-related absolute of Herbert Spencer. THE TRUTH SEEKER is on the list for a copy as soon as it is published, as Mr. Maple thinks very highly of the paper. We spend many delightful hours together, as he is an interesting conversationalist.

Inclosed find $1. G. A. GOETSCH.

That Is the Way to Round Them Up.

TUCSON, ARIZ., May 29, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $12, for which you will please send THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year to the addresses inclosed.

I will try to get more subscribers for you soon. Mrs. Freeman stirred up the reverend sky-pilots in great style while here. After she left Tucson they engaged the Opera House and advertised a mass meeting for the masses. The house was crowded; exercises opened with singing. Then the harangues began, the Rev. Mr. Francis, of the Congregational church, opened by saying he bore no ill will to any one; he loved his enemies, etc., but he soon branched off and made use of such pet names as "liars," "hypocrites," etc., for us Infidels; he denounced everything as false that Mrs. Freeman had asserted; claimed everything for the church, claimed that Benjamin Franklin was a Christian; that Girard college was a failure until the Bible was introduced within its walls. He finally wound up his tirade by stating that the Infidels once concluded to build a town without a church or preacher, and they called the town Liberty, which was situated in Missouri. But it proved a failure and God in his mercy wiped it from the face of the earth with a cyclone, and left nothing but a hole in the ground. That was a clincher on us. So he sat down, when I arose and asked him if he ever heard of any other place being wiped from the face of the earth by a cyclone. He arose and said, "Yes, and Tucson ought to be wiped from the earth for its wickedness." This was published next day in the Evening Citizen. The following day he came out with a flat denial of having used such an expression. The next day myself and nine others inserted a card in the same paper, stating that we heard him use the identical words as printed. And thus ended the controversy, as he failed to come to time after that round. He was completely knocked out.

Yours for Liberty, ISAAC E. CRUM.

[The minister probably meant Liberal, Mo., which was not swept from the earth by a tornado, nor by God.—ED. T. S.]

An Unparried Homethrns'.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., June 11, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Several of your readers have written to me for copies of the article which Rev. Dr. Milne proposed to reply to but changed his mind and concluded to ignore. Having but one copy, and as the question under consideration is a vital one in our issue against so-called Christianity [why "so-called," friend Shepherd?], I inclose it for you to reprint if you think it worthy. We should always hit our adversary on his sore places, and criminal statistics is a mighty tender and sore spot on the Christian corporosity. Some one ought to gather all the religio-criminal statistics obtainable in Christian and anti-Christian lands and publish them in pamphlet form. Parkville is a few miles below this city on the opposite bank of the Missouri river. Here is the article:

To the Leavenworth Times: A student was, some time ago, forced to withdraw from the Parkville college "family" because he declined to comply with two rules, to wit: "Read two or three chapters in the Bible daily," and "memorize five answers to questions in the Westminster Catechism."

The following extract is taken from a declaration of principles by the college management as published in their paper:

"If a man opposed in mind or in actual living to Christ be educated, he is the more dangerous. We tremble to see a man advancing in classes and not at the same time advancing in Christian living and thinking. We have never had a graduate who was not a professing Christian. Dr. McAfee [the deceased president] frequently said that he hoped God would spare him the trial of having a student come to graduation day without having taken Jesus Christ as his savior. Really, it is exceedingly doubtful if Dr. McAfee would have given a Park college diploma to a student not a Christian. We insist vigorously on a Christian education, because with any other kind the man is a dangerous character to the country, to society, to the cause of Christ."

That is one side of the picture. Now look on the other. Across the river from Parkville, stands the Kansas penitentiary. About one year ago Warden Case took a religious census of 744 inmates and reported 370 as never having been church members against 374 that were or had been as follows: Methodist, 79; Christian, 60; Catholic, 59; Baptist, 57; Presbyterian, 45; Lutheran, 30; United Brethren, 23; Congregationalist, 8; Episcopalian, 8; Quaker, 1. Regular attendants upon Sabbath school in youth, 500; not so, 244; parents church members, 500, as follows: Methodist, 175; Baptist, 155; Catholic, 69; Presbyterian, 42; Christian, 30; Lutheran, 20; United Brethren, 8; Congregationalists, 8; Episcopalian, 7; Advent, 4; Dunkard, 1; Quaker, 1. Not church members, 175; did not know, 69. No Jews, Infidels, Atheists, Deists, Spiritualists, Freethinkers, Agnostics, Universalists, or Unitarians are reported among either convicts or parents.

These figures do not seem to bear out Park college in its wholesale slander against non-Christians as being "dangerous characters."

On the contrary they point directly the other way. To agree with the Park college theory there ought not to be a single Christian in the Kansas penitentiary. But instead of such being the case it appears that every convict in it is a Christian, either by "profession," rearing, education, or belief. It is the most orthodox community we have in the state.

Twelve years ago Chaplin McCleery reported only one Infidel in the pen, but added the saving clause "that his Infidelity was not of a confirmed type." He was a sort of mugwump. Prison statistics the world over are substantially the same.

Only two causes can exist why those who do not "profess" or believe in Christianity never get into the penitentiaries. They are either too smart or they are too moral. Park college can take which ever horn of the dilemma it pleases.

Thirty-nine years ago a "slave" ran away from his cruel Christian "master" at Parkville (one of the projectors, I dare say, of this college) and crossed the river into Kansas. Immediately a great outcry was made in Missouri. That sort of thing must be nipped in the bud. Niggers running away into Kansas must be stopped. Rewards aggregating $2,000 were offered for this boy, dead or alive. Hundreds of desperate characters were soon on the hunt in portions of Kansas, principally at Lawrence and Topeka, aided by the "black law" element of the "free state" people. That poor, hunted fugitive, whose only crime was his black skin, knocked at the door of the writer of this communication one dark night and asked for food, shelter, and protection. Instead of "returning him to his master," according to the Christian Bible, and piously pocketing the $2,000, I wickedly and feloniously fed and secreted him for a few days, when Dan. Boutwell, now of Topeka, and myself, without hope of earthly reward, and at the peril of having our bodies riddled with bullets, put him through the lines to Nebraska.

In the day of final reckoning what a sad and bitter disappointment it will be to many of the unco pious who stride presumptuously up to the "golden gates of paradise," should they find them closed, with a notice thereon saying that—"Deeds and not creeds are the measure of fitness to enter here." S. R. SHEPHERD.

From the Alpine Republic.

OLLON, CANTON DE VAUD, SWITZERLAND, }
May 27, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Having recently made a tour through France, and now safely returned to my village home in the Alpine region of Switzerland, I presume that a few lines to our old friend THE TRUTH SEEKER may be acceptable, especially as my observations extended to matters affecting our mutual cause.

In skeptical France a new crusade has broken out. It is, however, not fought with sword and spear, or other bloody weapons, but, after the fashion of our age, in big words and inflammatory speeches. In commemoration of the great crusade led 800 years ago by Peter of Amiens, certain conspicuous lights of the church have organized this crusade, not to the holy sepulcher, but against the ungodly Liberalism and Infidelity of France. The monk Monsabré is the fanatical leader of the movement, and causes great excitement among the religious section of the population. Like his predecessor of eight centuries ago, he has adopted the motto: "Debout! Dieu le veut" (arise! God wills it!). In flaming words, he points to the dangers of an irreligious republic and a godless government, and summons his hearers to action for holy Mother Church, which is so rapidly waning in power and influence.

The movement is not likely to effect any political changes, as a considerable fraction of the church officials themselves very much doubt that "God wills" the crusade, seeing that the bishops of France are appointed by an Infidel government, and in their sympathies divided within themselves. In fact, many of these bishops would just as soon exchange their miter for the turban of the Mufti if there should be any worldly advantage in it. Even the pope of Rome may at this moment not particularly care for the show, as, in return for certain worldly concessions, he has of late permitted the Catholics of France to obey the government and submit to the laws of the country; in fact, the faithful have even been instructed to vote for the Infidel ministerial party. In view of these facts, much sympathy from Rome may hardly be expected.

Judging by results, we must almost come to the conclusion that God did not will the great crusades from the eleventh to the thirteenth century. In spite of the fact that Europe during three centuries vomited its armed masses by the hundred thousand upon the shores of Palestine, the holy sepulcher is still to this day in the hands of the Infidels, and who knows whether the Liberalism which pervaded Europe, more or less, so as to necessitate such holy institutions as the Inquisition, did not date from the time of the crusades?

By all appearance, crusades in France seem to be infectious. Hardly had the monk Monsabré completed his first cycle of tirades, when the well-known doctrinaire Thébaud commenced an agitation against Protestants, and started on a journey of denunciation through France. His trouble is that, in a population of 36,000,000, there are 700,000 Protestants, where France ought to be a strictly Catholic nation, and that many high positions of state in the administration, as well as in the foreign service, are held by Protestants, which, in his opinion, is disastrous to the interests of the country. He does not advocate a general massacre à la Night of St. Bartholomew, nor an expulsion—such remedies would, as things are now, be impossible—but that more consideration be shown to Catholics. Who will doubt the wisdom of such a multitude of counsel, which inflicts France at this time?

According to late reports, the American Protective Association has had a great convocation at Milwaukee, and done some important work. I, from personal experience, know that the Roman Catholic church has more power in the United States of America than in many European countries with large Catholic populations. And why should the Roman Catholic church be so eager to establish schools in the United States, where already good school systems exist, while Spain, Italy, and other Catholic countries, where any sort of a school would be a godsend, show such a deplorable state of affairs?

If any of your generous readers, who have any literature to spare affecting our mutual cause, or for distribution, will kindly drop me a paper occasionally, I will remember them in my prayers.

Yours faithfully, A. S. ROSENROLL.

A Gentle Protest.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., May 28, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I am not a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I have read it nearly every week during the past seven or eight years. I neither borrow nor beg; but I read it for a' that. I order it through newsdealers, and it costs me nearly $4 a year. Very frequently I have had newsdealers keep an extra copy for sale, paying them for those not sold. Considering these facts, perhaps I have as much "right" as some of your subscribers to offer suggestions or express my opinion on a matter I have long borne in mind. If my suggestions are not adopted, I shall not cease to pay for and read the best of all Freethought journals—THE TRUTH SEEKER—(no cigars are necessary, and I have not "P.-H.'ed" [What does that mean?—Ed. T. S.] since I quit type-sticking!)

THE TRUTH SEEKER is "a journal of Freethought and Reform." It is because of this fact, I presume, that tiresome, bombastic, pro-and-con discussions of the tariff, finance, etc., are allowed very frequently to fill valuable space in its columns. This seems to me entirely wrong. Perhaps such a view of the matter is erroneous. Undoubtedly, such will be the opinion of many. But I believe I have valid reasons to substantiate my position. I am not aware that our Freethought propagandists go about the country delivering lectures for or against the tariff, on the merits or demerits of free-trade, or on financial questions. If these things are of such vital importance—if the privilege of holding such views as we chose, and giving utterance to those which we now enjoy regarding these subjects—is in any way menaced, why are they not given a place in the repertoires of Freethought speakers? But they are not of vital importance! It seems to me that the most Chauvinistic person cannot claim that these questions can possibly effect a disintegration of these United States, nor affect the liberty of free speech. The worshipers of superstition may gain sufficient power to enable them to say to the Freethinker: "If you do not believe the Bible is inspired of God, if you do not believe Sunday is more sacred than other days, you must not give public expression to your conclusions, and must abide by our God-in-the-Constitution laws;" but I do not think the adoption of a free-trade policy would result in the prohibition of all discussion of that subject. And the same holds good regarding the adoption of a protective tariff policy. But there is another thing to be considered in connection with this subject. Any one wishing information about the financial questions of the day can get (without a large expenditure of coin) books or pamphlets (the authors of which are political economists of national repute) wherein the various sides of those questions are set forth in all their glory. By writing to the national executive committee of the two great political parties, one can get all the literature he will need in the study of the relative merits of a protective tariff, tariff for revenue only, or free trade. Then, too, we can read all sides of those questions in the leading newspapers of the country. Providing the foregoing is true (and I do not believe it can be gainsaid), is it not manifestly unfair to those who not care to read such discussions (and undoubtedly there are many of THE TRUTH SEEKER's readers—subscribers—too, who do not) to give them so much space—or any space? Three or four dollars a year is an exorbitant sum to pay for such discussions, especially when they can be obtained elsewhere at a far less cost. Scientific books and publications are expensive. Many of your readers cannot afford to buy them, and do not live where they can enjoy the advantages afforded by a large public library, but would like to know the latest that has been discovered in the realm of science. Why not, then, in lieu of all these senescent and threadbare themes, publish interesting scientific news and articles, sketches of scientists of the present day and biographies of noted scientists of the past, some of the results of their researches, and their religious beliefs or lack of belief resultant from those researches? Would this not be of much more benefit to the majority?

In a recent issue, a San Diego (this state) contributor attacked the present Hawaiian government—I do not pretend to know which side is or was in the right, so I do not wish to discuss that part of the question. There are, however, some things in his article which I cannot allow to pass unnoticed. I do not think he should have been so positive in some of his statements. When people who lived in Hawaii before and at the time the revolution occurred vary so much in their accounts of the affair, it seems to me our San Diegoan friend has not sufficient proof for the assertion that the Dole government is in the wrong altogether. There is a newspaper man in this city who was a resident of Honolulu before and during the revolution, and he claims that the revolutionists had the right on their side. This is from an impartial witness—impartial, because he had no "iron in the fire," and the result of the revolution benefited him in no way. Your contributor also made the statement, when quoting from that paper in defense of his position, that the San Francisco Call is one of the most conservative papers on the coast in regard to the Hawaiian matter. In this he has evidently been misinformed. When the fact that that sheet is practically controlled by Claus Spreckels is taken into consideration, and that the Dole government is inimical to the interests of that gentleman, you will readily perceive how "conservative" the Call is bound to be, and how much weight is to be attached to testimony from such a source regarding Hawaiian affairs. Charles M. Shortridge is supposed to be the proprietor of the sheet; but the gentleman I have named is the "power behind the throne," for it was mostly his money that paid for it. A new home is being built for the paper, and it is pretty well understood that Spreckels's money is being put up for it. Before coming into possession of the Call, Mr. Shortridge owned a small newspaper property in San Jose. The Call was sold for over $200,000. The building now being erected is costing more thousands. Is this not sufficient evidence that Mr. Shortridge has been and is being helped? Be that as it may, it is not denied that Mr. Spreckels practically bought the paper and gave it to Mr. Shortridge, nor that he controls its policy.

While living in Fort Wayne, Ind., some four years ago, I first heard of Rev. Father Koenig, a Catholic priest and the manufacturer of Father Koenig's remedies. Not long ago I noticed a half-inch advertisement in THE TRUTH SEEKER setting forth the virtues of the Rev. Father's medicines. Think of it—a Catholic priest advertising in a Freethought journal!

Mr. Robertson's "Noah's Log" was an exceedingly funny piece. Give us some more, Mr. Robertson.

If any Infidel in this part of the country knows of any place where an asthmatic can find relief and light work of some kind, I shall feel greatly obliged to him if he will write me. I was in San Diego a short time, and it seemed to benefit me some, but I could not stay there because I was unable to secure work I was able to do. I cannot do anything which requires much physical exertion. I can cook some, wash dishes, milk, and do other light chores. I am willing to do any honest work that I can do, and wages are of minor importance—just enough to pay expenses. What I want is health. I am a printer, but machines have spoiled that trade here.

I should like very much to hear from Mr. Heston.

Wishing all kinds of success to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will stop.

Yours truly, F. G. BALL.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations,
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Babyhood.

Heigh-ho, Babyhood, Tell me where you linger;
Let's toddle home again, for we have gone astray—
Take this eager hand of mine, and lead me by the finger
Back to the lotus lands of the Far Away.

Turn back the leaves of life—don't read the story—
Let's find the picture and fancy all the rest;
We can fill the written pages with a brighter glory
Than O'd Time, the story teller, at his very best.

Turn to the brook, where the honeysuckle, tipping
O'er its vase of perfume, spills it on the breeze,
And the bees and humming-birds in ecstasy are sipping
From the fairy flagons of the blooming locust-trees.

Turn to the lane where we used to "teetertotter," Printing little foot palms in the mellow mold—
Laughing at the lazy cattle wading in the water
Where the ripples dimple round the buttercups of gold.

Where the dusky turtle lies basking on the gravel
Of the sunny sand-bar in the middle tide,
And the ghostly dragon fly pauses in his travel
To rest like a blossom where the waterlily died.

Heigh-ho, Babyhood! Tell me where you linger;
Let's toddle home again, for we have gone astray—
Take this eager hand of mine and lead me by the finger
Back to the lotus lands of the Far Away.

—James Whitcomb Riley.

A Story of the Revolution.

Once there was a girl named Eunice Locke, and she lived a long time ago—in the time of the American Revolution. It was in the last days of May in the year 1776, and Eunice was not quite fifteen. There came a notice one day to the officers of the town of Townsend, where this bright young girl lived, that fifteen men were wanted to go to the front as soldiers. There was a band in training, and it was immediately called out, and one among the fifteen chosen to go was the brother of Eunice. It was late at night when he came home and told his mother what had been done. The next morning when Eunice came down stairs she found her mother weeping, for John was to march the day after the morrow at sunrise. The mother said John would be away some time, if, indeed, he ever returned to them again. He had plenty of summer clothes, but no winter garments. In that old time there were no stores with clothing ready made, and each family had to not only cut and sew, but spin and weave all the wearing apparel. The tears in her mother's eyes made the heart of Eunice ache beyond expression. The father was away, being a member of the Massachusetts Assembly.

"What does John need, mother?" asked Eunice.

"Trousers!" was the reply.

"Oh, if that is all," said the brave Eunice, "we will spin and weave him a pair before he goes."

"Why," said the mother, "the wool is on the sheep's back, and the sheep are in pasture."

"I know it," replied Eunice, and, turning to a younger brother, she bade him take the salt dish and call the sheep into the yard.

"O you poor child," said the sorrowing mother, "there are no sheep shears within three miles and a half."

"But," said the intrepid girl, "I have some small ones at the loom."

"But, Eunice, dear, you cannot spin and weave the cloth in so short a time."

"I am sure we can, mother," she answered.

"How can you, child? How can you weave it—there is a long web of linen in the loom now."

"No matter. I can find an empty loom somewhere," she bravely said.

By this time the sheep came up to the yard, their tinkling bells announcing the fact of their approach.

Eunice sent her sister to bring the wheel and cards, while she went for the wool. Her brother helped her secure a white sheep, from which she sheared with her loom shears half enough for a web, and then let her go with the rest of her fleece. The little sister ran in with the wool, while Luther ran for a black sheep, holding her while Eunice cut off wool for the filling and half the warp; and then she was let go with the remainder of her fleece. The wool thus obtained was duly carded, spun, washed, sized and dried. An empty loom was found at a neighbor's, the web got in and woven, the cloth prepared, cut, made and pressed, two or three hours before the time of her brother's departure for the seat of war. It was all done in forty hours, all by hand, without the aid of any modern improvement or machinery. And Eunice felt no weariness. She wept not, nor faltered. She felt she was serving her country. She was relieving her mother from anxiety. She was preparing a garment for her darling brother. But when all was done, she went to her room, and her over-wrought nerves and bursting heart were relieved by tears and sobs. It is supposed that the brother was one of General Stark's soldiers, and with such courage and devotion General Burgoyne could not by any means "march through the heart of America," as he had threatened to do.

The Slighted One.

What interests center on prosperous farm—
The beauties of nature combining to charm;
Rich odors of grasses and fruits and flowers,
Singing of birds making love in their bowers;
Bees in the clover extracting the honey,
To tickle the palate and bring in the money;
And gamboling squirrel with nest in the wall,
Where he lays up for winter sweet nuts in the fall.
Happy animals all, though freely they roam,
Know as well as the boy, the way to their home.

To mimic the robin, the sweet bobolink,
And all other songsters of which we can think,
Many poets inspired in prosody sing,
And praises of plumage harmoniously ring.

The poet does honor to horse and the dog,
To the cow and the sheep, but not to the hog.

With scorn he is treated, reproachful his name,

Yet no brute on the farm enjoys greater fame;

Though now we confine him in narrowest pen,

He had widest range in gospel time when
He imbibed seven spirits transferred by a goddy—

Cast out of a human they entered his body!

With those spirits he ran and swam for his life,

While men were engaged in theological strife—

Conjuring new gods and their demons of air

To smite unbelievers in answer to prayer.

Now, seven parts human at least are in swine;

More like human is theirs than flesh of the kine;

And when with the swill-pail one goes to the sty,

What human resemblance in his twinkling-eye.

Though more honest than man and much less a sinner,

He grunts as man grunts when waiting for dinner;

Like man he is stubborn and delves much in mud—

These elements human are in piggy's blood.

An esthetic dudeling the pig pen will shun,
And the neurotic weakling will shudder and run;

But fears not the farmer, in dark wintry clime,

With pork in the barrel though not found in rhyme;

Him inviting there stands his savior near by;

No salvation comes down from spook in the sky.

Though his dwelling be back of or under the barn,

The hog boils the doughnuts on prosperous farm.

Correspondence.

STAPLETON, N. Y., June 12, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It is such a long time since I have written to the Corner that I suppose you have quite forgotten me. I think our Corner is progressing steadily, for of late I have noticed such interesting and intelligent letters, and I am sure we owe thanks to Ida Ballou for her instructive writings. Does our editor intend to travel this summer? I hope so, for the descriptions of your last travels were beautiful. I enjoyed them very much, and am sure all the Corner readers did the same. You make your descriptions so vivid that one almost imagines himself in the place. Your books are the same. Anyone can tell they were written by one who does not believe in superstition but in truth and reason, and such, I am glad to know, is the editor of our Corner.

I am going to Callicoon, Sullivan county, this summer for five or six weeks. If you desire a description of the place I will take down a few lines each day of what I see, and at the end of my visit I will send it to the Corner. I should like to correspond, and if written to will answer promptly.

ELSIE L. SEIDEL.

[No, the editor of the Corner is not thinking of going far from home this summer. She would be pleased to have descriptive letters from Elsie or any other friend who visits new places.]—ED. C. C.

PUEBLO, COLO., June 5, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Your kind letter came duly, and I was pleased, as I always am, to hear from you. Your letters bear the impress of an affectionate nature, and I know I should love you could I meet you face to face. If I am ill, I invariably start on the road toward improvement when I hear from you. It was rather strange that you felt as though you were needed at home when poor Joseph was sick. Your sister's mind or his—perhaps both—sent telepathic messages to you. Such things occur in our family quite frequently. I often hear, or seem to do so, persons in conversation with members of my family, especially my daughter Maude. Last week on Memorial Day, when she was sewing in a rich and aristocratic family, I thought I heard them speaking of my poem, printed that day in a city daily, and felt that they treated her with greater deference when she had told them it was her mother's, all of which happened.

The Children's Corner improves with the children telling of the peculiarities of their different dwelling places. I am always pleased to hear from each one. I hope Ida Ballou will continue her biographical sketches. They are very interesting to me.

With best wishes for yourself and all the young people, I am yours now and always,

MARY B. FINCH.

How a Woman Paid Her Debts.

I am out of debt, and thanks to the Dish Washer business for it. In the past five weeks I have made over $500 and I am so thankful that I feel like telling everybody, so that they can be benefited by my experience. Anybody can sell Dish Washers, because everybody wants one, especially when it can be got so cheap. You can wash and dry the dishes in two minutes. I believe that in two years from now every family will have one. You can get full particulars and hundreds of testimonials by addressing the Iron City Dish Washer Co., 145 S. Highland Ave., Station A, Pittsburgh, Pa., and you can't help but make money in this business. I believe that I can clear over $3,000 the coming year, and I am not going to let such an opportunity pass without improvement. We can't expect to succeed without trying.

HOME AGAIN.

After a delightful trip and healthful vacation I have returned home ready for business, and shall hereafter be found at the old store personally attending to all orders and work my many friends may favor me with.

It will be my special endeavor to please all and to conduct business in such a manner that it will be an object and to the interest of all to favor me with their kind orders.

If in need of a Diamond, Watch, any piece of Jewelry, Silver or plated ware, Emblem or Watch work, please send to me and I will positively send you best goods at lowest prices.

CAREER OF RELIGIOUS IDEAS.

Their Ultimate: The Religion of Science.

By HUDSON TUTTLE.

This book is a study in the evolution of religious ideas, touching all forms of religious worship, and treating at length on the authenticity and reliability of the Christian religion. It is a 12mo book of 146 pages and the price is now reduced from 50 cents in paper and 75 cents in cloth to 25 cents in paper, 50 cents in cloth. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

New Publications.

Unless otherwise specified, all publications noticed here can be had of THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY, at the price named.

Right Living.

Susan H. Wixon's new book, "Right Living," is one of the best books ever published. It is full of splendid truths, told in such simple, beautiful language, and in such a telling, striking way, that every boy and girl can understand them. It is pure, good, and ennobling, and any one will be made better by reading it. If Susan H. Wixon, or the cause she so grandly represents, could have molded the thought of a few of the past generations, the "Woman Who Did," and "Is This Your Son, my Lord?" would never have appeared. There would have been no need for them.

Fathers and mothers, if you want to place in your children's hands a book that will help make them manly and womanly, get for them "Right Living," even if you must make a sacrifice to do it. Parents who live the lives that "Right Living" advocates will bring into the world healthy and happy children, and a knowledge of its precepts will help to keep them healthy and happy. Every page, every line, contains a sublime truth, a knowledge of which will make better conditions for the development of all that is good on earth.

Miss Wixon made a present of this volume to the "Wixon Group" of the Silverton Secular Sunday-school, and the boys and girls, in fact, every one of us, feel very proud of it. I thank its noble author for the great good she has done and is doing.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies..... $1.00
Fifty copies..... 4.50
One hundred copies..... 8.00

400 Years OF Freethought

By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pp., Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. $5.

With The Truth Seeker for One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

Price, $5. With "The Truth Seeker" One Year, $6.50.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES.

A new edition of that splendid prose poem "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt beveled edge. The size is 13x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

Not for Parsons.

EFFIE: "Please, Uncle Arthur, do come and play chess with me." Uncle Arthur: "Oh, Effie! Don't you remember? It's Sunday." Effie: "Well, we can let the bishop win."—Pall Mall Gazette.

MISS DOGWOOD: "You are very active in charity work, Miss Slumly, but how is it you never visit Rat Alley or Tumbledown Lane?" Miss Slumly: "You know, my dear, I belong to St. Dives church, and it owns all that part of the town."

THE Archbishop of Canterbury appears to belong to that large class of intelligent-ignorant Englishmen who are not just sure whether the Western Continent is within the pale of civilization or not. In a recent letter he speaks of the desire for Christian unity, "at home and abroad and in America."

MINISTER'S SON: "Father, is yours a long sermon to-day?" "No, Jimmy, not very." "But how long? Please tell me." "Well, about twenty minutes, I should say. But why are you so anxious to know?" "Because, father, the boys say they will thrash me awfully if you are more than half an hour."—New Zealand Advocate.

"Young man," the solemn stranger said, "What's going on inside?" "A baseball game—eight innin's played," The budding sport replied. "Baseball upon the Sabbath day? O wicked, sinful land! Er—in the ninth now, did you say? Young man—how do they stand?"—Kansas City Journal.

A WITTY member of our Unitarian fellowship was introduced one day to a churchman of the stricter sort, who inquired: "Did you say you were a Unitarian? Ah! well, then, I can recognize you as a gentleman, but not as a fellow Christian." "Oh, never mind about that," was the breezy reply; "I can recognize you as a fellow Christian, but not as a gentleman!"

"ANTICHRIST" sends us for the column, "Not for Parsons," this: Bright Boy: "Ma, you know the prayer-book says Jesus Christ descended into hell?" Mother: "Yes." Bright Boy: "Well, our rector this morning read about Jesus saying to the thief on the cross, 'To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise.'" Mother: "Well, what do you want to know?" Bright Boy: "I want to know how in hell the two could meet in paradise."

In that day [Voltaire's time] the dead saints were the best physicians; St. Valentine cured the epilepsy; St. Gervasius was exceedingly good for rheumatism; St. Michael for cancer; St. Judas for coughs and colds; St. Ovidius restored the hearing; St. Sebastian was good for the bites of snakes and the stings of poisonous insects; St. Apollonia for toothache; St. Clara for any trouble with the eyes, and St. Hubert for hydrophobia. It was known that doctors reduced the revenues of the church; that was enough—science was the enemy of religion.—Ingersoll.

CURIOSITIES OF RELIGIOUS FERVOR. Visiting in North Carolina some years ago, I was urged by a colored attendant to go to a camp-meeting near by to hear an "edication" (educated) preacher. I went, and this was part of the sermon I heard: "De Bible is a very ole book, my brederin, a very ole book. It neber was fixed no sich fashion as it is now een de old days. It used to be print on rolls what could be mash up een a mighty leetle size. Saint Paul, he lub de Gospel dat much till he swallow one ob dem rolls. Dat make de scribe certify dat de word of God was een him."

A South Carolina brother who had long manifested an anxiety to preach, finally obtained permission to do so, and the subject given him was the parable of the loaves and fishes. He was told that he must give special emphasis to the miraculous character of the feast, and he did so as follows:

"Dey was a big supper party giv in Galilee, an' a uncommon lot of people wasaxed to come to it. When dey all got dere de misses find she had forgot to giv de order for supper. Den Christ, who was one of de party, tells de misses to fotch in two plates what was on de dresser, and off of dem plates de whole party had all de fine bread and fried fishes what dey could eat. And dey et and et, and de mericle of dat supper was dat dey didn't bus'."

Once, in the transporting enthusiasm of a revival meeting, the above-mentioned Zeba [see this column, last week's TRUTH SEEKER], with his eyes fixed upon the ceiling, appealed strongly to the Lord to appear before the wayward sinners, who would not hearken to the word and come forward to the mourners' bench. "Come down, Lord! Come down!" shrieked the preacher in an agony of entreaty; "we's a-'pendin' on you to come right now and convict dese hardened hearts. Come right down t'rough de roof; we'll pay for every plank you bus' off."—Reported by Olive F. Gunby in New York Post.

READ AND GIVE TO YOUR FRIENDS.

Mailed singly for 10 cents each; twelve of any one, or an assortment of twelve, for $1.

AN ANTIDOTE ANALYZED. Reply to a Christian who had attacked Freethinkers, and Exposing the Inconsistency of Christians generally. H. C. Luse.

BIBLE TEMPERANCE. Showing that Liquor Drinking is Commended, Defended, and Enjoined by the Bible. Edwin C. Walker. CHRISTIANITY A REWARD FOR CRIME Authenticated by the Bible. O. B. Whitford, M.D.

DID MAN FALL? Is the Garden of Eden a Fact? Israel W. Groh.

EPIDEMIC DELUSIONS. A Lecture by Frederic R. Marvin, M.D. Giving reasonable reasons for Religious and other Delusions.

FALSE CLAIMS OF THE CHURCH. John E. Remsburg's most noted work, and one of the most effective ever written by any Freethinker.

FIRST EPISTLE OF BENNETT THE APOSTLE TO THE TRUTH SEEKERS. Written while journeying in and near the land of Yahweh. Containing the best moral instructions of the world from the great teachers of the former ages. D. M. Bennett.

THE GIANT DELUSION. A paper read before the Freethought International Congress at Chicago. One of Otto Wettstein's fraternal attacks on Spiritualism.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY. To which is added a poem on Thomas Paine. One of Samuel P. Putnam's most brilliant lectures. Every Christian who asks the idiotic question, "What Has Infidelity Done?" should be induced to read this book, if he has to be paid to do it.

HOW CAN WE BE SAVED? Was Jesus Supernaturally Conceived, and did he Rise from the Dead? Israel W. Groh.

INGERSOLL AND JESUS. Showing how the two agree. A poem by Samuel P. Putnam.

THE LIMITATIONS OF TOLERATION. A discussion between Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic R. Condit, Ex-Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, before the Nineteenth Century Club of New York. "Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him." Colonel Ingersoll maintains this, the others deny it. Mr. Condit is a Roman Catholic, Mr. Woodford a Protestant.

MATERIALISM: Its History, and Its Influence Upon Society. Dr. Louis Buchner.

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE WORKERS. A Consideration of the Marvels and Miracles of the New Testament. One of John Peck's best books.

MOSES BEFORE THE COURT, or The Forgery of the Old Testament. Dedicated to the Clergy. H. J. Seignuret, M.D.

THE NEW GOD. "It is an open secret that man has always made his Gods. They exist in and through him, as the image exists in and through the mirror. 'Take away man, and you take away God—the image vanishes.' This pamphlet, therefore, is a consideration of what kind of a God man should make. Samuel P. Putnam.

ORTHODOXY. A lecture by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and one of that great man's best. The subjects considered are: Orthodox Religion Dying Out, Religious Deaths and Births, The Religion of Reciprocity, Mohammed, The Destruction of Art, The Discovery of America, Copernicus and Kepler, Charles Darwin, Special Providence, The Latest Creed, God as a Governor, The Love of God, The Fall of Man, The Atonement, The Second Birth, Inspiration, The Reign of Truth and Love, The Wars It Brought, The Resurrection, The Judgment-Day, Pious Evasions, "No Bible, No Civilization," Miracles of the New Testament, The Ascension, Casting out Devils, Necessity of Belief, Eternal Punishment, Some who Are Damned, What I Believe, Immortality. This lecture is on the famous text, "The Clergy know that I know that they do not know."

PERSONAL EXISTENCE AFTER DEATH IMPROBABLE. L. R. Smith.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS MASS MEETING AT LINCOLN HALL, WASHINGTON. Being the Speeches of Hon. FREDERICK DOUGLASS and Col. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL on the Decision of the United States Court that the Civil Rights Act is Unconstitutional. Fifty-three large octavo pages, of which Colonel Ingersoll's speech occupies 38 pages.

PULPIT, PEW, AND CRADLE. So long as the Pulpit speaks to believing Pews composed chiefly of mothers, the cradle will be rocked by ghosts and the race will remain on its knees to a devil of its own creation and to a God who is powerless against him. One of Helen Gardner's brightest efforts.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY BETTER THAN ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. M. Babcock.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS. One of L. K. Washburn's best lectures, and it is, like all of his, very good.

THE ROARING LION ON THE TRACK. One of M. Babcock's comical sermons.

SCIENCE vs. RELIGION, or The Conflict Between Reason and Superstition. T. C. Widdicombe.

ST. MATTHEW BEFORE THE COURT. Presenting the evidence of the forgery of his alleged gospel. H. J. Seignuret.

SISTER LUCY AND HER AWFUL DISCLOSURES REGARDING NEW HALL CONVENT. Showing that Convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom.

SPIRITUALISM FROM A MATERIALISTIC STANDPOINT. B. F. Underwood. Written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK. Torture Implements Employed in the 15th and 16th centuries for the promulgation of Christianity. Being the Nuremberg Collection, with specimens from the Holy Inquisition. 28 pictures. The descriptions and reflections by George E. Macdonald.

VICTOR HUGO'S ORATION ON VOLTAIRE, delivered on the one hundredth anniversary of Voltaire's death. Translated by James Parton, author of the Life of Voltaire. To which are added the three great poems of Goethe, George Eliot, and Longfellow.

WAS CHRIST CRUCIFIED? Austin Bierbower. A lawyer's consideration of the evidence of that alleged event.

WAS JESUS INSANE? A consideration of Christ's alleged acts which would lead one to that conclusion. I. K. Washburn.

WHY DON'T HE LEND A HAND? And other Agnostic Poems. Samuel P. Putnam. The title poem is perhaps the most popular of Mr. Putnam's many poems, and a great many editions of it have been called for. The other poems are: The Golden Age, The Ideal and the Real, Not Dead, but Living, Fruition, Hope, Thomas Paine, Nature's Gospel, Address to Deity, and the short poem so often recited with great effect by Charles Watts, Give Us Light.

WILL THE COMING MAN WORSHIP GOD? B. F. Underwood; written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

WOMAN: FOUR CENTURIES OF PROGRESS. A lecture delivered at the Freethinkers' International Congress at Chicago. Considering: The Cause of Woman's Subjugation, The Canon Law and Its Effects Upon Her, Theology Never Helpful to Woman, Invention Woman's Friend, Freethought the Benefactor of Woman. Susan H. Wixon.

WOMAN: HER PAST AND PRESENT, HER RIGHTS AND WRONGS. A lecture delivered before the Woman Suffrage Association of Denver, Col., by B. F. Underwood.

Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

LINCOLN

This is Colonel INGERSOLL's great lecture, printed in a handsome pamphlet, and containing the Century's famous portrait of Lincoln—said to be the best extant. Price, 25 cents.

SHAKSPERE

"An intellectual ocean, whose waves touched all the shores of thought." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with likeness of Shakspeare from the Kesselstadt death mask. Price, 25 cents.

Gems of Thought.

To fast, to pray, a priest's virtue; to succor, virtue of a citizen.—Voltaire.

PEOPLE who do not believe in the same doctrine should not pretend to stand on the same creed.—Galveston News.

VERY few men, and still fewer women, form opinions in which the general and the abstract have a due place. The particular and the concrete are alone operative in their thoughts.—Herbert Spencer.

THE conditions of fashionable society also are incongenial to conversation. Conduct there is prompted not by the occasion but by etiquette. People guide themselves, not by consulting feeling but by consulting precedents.—A. M. Lorentz.

SOCIETY will be free. It will not violate the private conscience. It will not compel. It will invite. Persuasion will always arch battle. The individualist will steady history toward his ideal. The variations and errancies that to some bring discouragement may yet only testify to the propulsion of life to freer opportunities.—Horace L. Traubel.

NAY, never falter; no great deed is done by falterers who ask for certainty. No good is certain, but the steadfast mind. The undivided will to seek the good: 'Tis that compels the elements, and wrings A human music from the indifferent air. The greatest gift the hero leaves his race is to have been a hero. Say we fail!—We feed the high tradition of the world And leave our spirit in our children's breasts.—George Eliot.

THE trend of the times is toward centralization of power and the deification of law. Precedent is exalted to the place that properly belongs to the Constitution. Prejudices more or less pronounced have been allowed to swerve men from justice, and in this departure from well-established law and legal principles, the fundamental law of the state—that law from which all other law receives the only power to bind which it has—this fundamental law is well-nigh lost sight of; and when the guarantees of the Constitution are swept away, when our most sacred of all law is set aside, in what respect are we better off than the despotisms of Europe having no written constitutions—no established characters protecting the people from the violations of law on the part of their servants, the governments?—American Sentinel.

WHAT are the results of theological compromise among the cultured classes? Some still hold their ancestral creeds in mediæval shadow, which admits no ray of scientific light to disturb their foregone conclusions. External to this faithful group are thousands of educated men, who recognize that science has swept supernaturalism clear of the human horizon for all who dare to gaze with independent vision. But modern respectability demands, if not the substance, at least the semblance, of belief; and Agnostic skeptics, therefore, subscribe for family pews, in which they periodically curse their Unitarian friends, and seem to pray with rigid lips to some unknown God to miraculously control external laws, whose action science forecasts. Domestic reticence on all things spiritual follows this public parody of faith; and unread Bibles thus become a household fetish.—Gill.

THE church firmly believed in the existence of witches and devils and fiends. In this way the church had every enemy within her power. It simply had to charge him with being a wizard, with holding communications with devils, and the ignorant mob were ready to tear him to pieces. So prevalent was this belief, this belief in the supernatural, that the poor people were finally driven to make the best possible terms they could with the spirit of evil. This frightful doctrine filled every friend with suspicion of his friend; it made the husband denounce the wife, children their parents, parents their children. It destroyed the amenities of humanity; it did away with justice in courts; it broke the bond of friendship; it filled with poison the golden cup of life; it turned earth into a very perdition peopled with abominable, malicious, and hideous fiends. Such was the result of belief in the supernatural; such was the result of giving up the evidence of their own senses and relying upon dreams, visions, and fears. Such was the result of the attack upon the human reason; such was the result of depending on the imagination, on the supernatural; such was the result of living in this world for another; of depending upon priests instead of upon ourselves. The Protestants vied with Catholics; Luther stood side by side with the priests he had deserted in promoting this belief in devils and fiends. To the Catholic every Protestant was possessed by a devil; to the Protestant every Catholic was the home of a fiend. All order, all regular succession of causes and effects, were known no more; the natural ceased to exist; the learned and the ignorant were on a level. The priest was caught in the net he had spread for the peasant, and Christendom became a vast madhouse, with the insane for keepers.—Ingersoll.

A Good Child

is usually healthy, and both conditions are developed by use of proper food. The Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is the best infant's food; so easily prepared that improper feeding is inexcusable and unnecessary.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

A small farm of 10 acres 86 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water, good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes walk of the railroad station, 9 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes walk.

The place is specially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1,000 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest, overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

THE PLACE CAN BE BOUGHT FOR $3,500.

Catarrh Cannot Be Cured

with LOCAL APPLICATIONS, as they cannot reach the seat of the disease. Catarrh is a blood or constitutional disease, and in order to cure it you must take internal remedies. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, and acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces. Hall's Catarrh Cure is not a quack medicine. It was prescribed by one of the best physicians in this country for years, and is a regular prescription. It is composed of the best tonics known, combined with the best blood purifiers, acting directly on the mucous surfaces. The perfect combination of the two ingredients is what produces such wonderful results in curing Catarrh. Send for testimonials free.

ADMIRAL DA GAMA, who led the revolt against the Brazilian government of Peixoto a year or more ago, and who fled to Argentina on the collapse of the rebellion, has been keeping up a desultory warfare against the government for some time. He is now reported to have committed suicide after being deserted by most of his men when defeated at the battle near Santa Ana, Rio Grande do Sul.

ON June 27th the International Hahnemann Homeopathic Association was in session at New London, Conn. The convention voted to use all the influence of the society in seeking the repeal of the compulsory laws governing the vaccination of school children and government employees. The conservative members admitted that vaccination often led to such diseases as leprosy, tuberculosis, and cancer troubles.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY is dead. He passed away at Eastbourne, England, at 3:45 p.m., June 29th. Thomas Henry Huxley was born in Ealing, Middlesex, England, May 4, 1825. He was one of that group of great men of science and of philosophers who have made the English name illustrious in this century by their contributions to the store of human knowledge, all working from the basis of the principle of development. Of this group of evolutionists, only Herbert Spencer is now left. Professor Huxley was a tower of strength in progressive polemics and many defenders of teleological superstitions have good reason to remember their attempts to overthrow him.

THE Herald gives interesting figures of the death rates of European cities: Among the highest death-rates are those of Moscow, 34.1 deaths per 1,000 of population; St. Petersburg, 31.4; Rouen, 31.3; Havre, 29.8; Naples, 27.7, and Milan, 25. Dublin had a mortality of 24.7 per 1,000; Munich, 23.7; Cologne, 23.1; Prague, 22.1, and Bordeaux, 21.3. Among the lowest death-rates are those of London, Liege, and Berlin, respectively 17.7, 17.6, and 17.2. Still lower are the figures for The Hague, 16.9; for Frankfurt, 16.5, and for Bristol, 15.4. It is very noticeable that in some of the large towns and cities of Europe the actual death-rate has been immensely reduced by modern sanitation. The mortality of London in 1870 was 24.3 per 1,000, and in 1881, 21.6. The death-rate in Paris in 1881 was 25.5, but it is now only 20.2. As late as 1873 Berlin's death-rate was 28, and in 1878 Professor Virchow showed it was increasing. It is, therefore, apparently a great triumph of sanitary science that in 1894 it should be so low.

A FRIEND of Brown University has offered the sum of $200 as a prize to encourage the historical study of the development of religious liberty in America. The following regulations respecting its award are proposed: (1) The prize shall be open to general competition. (2) It shall be given to the writer of the best essay on one of the three following themes: (a) A critical comparison of the claims put forward on behalf of Rhode Island and Maryland, respectively, regarding the first establishment of religious liberty in America; (b) A critical history of the movement towards disestablishment and religious liberty in Connecticut; (c) A critical history of the movement towards disestablishment and religious liberty in Massachusetts. (3) No essay shall be received which is not founded upon original research. (4) The prize shall be awarded at commencement, 1896; essays submitted in competition for it shall be placed in the hands of the president of Brown University on or before May 1, 1896.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

Something QUITE NEW & UNIQUE

THE BETTER WORLD
A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE
By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

What a New Subscriber, Who Has Received His Pictorial Text-Book, Says of It.

LAMAR, Mo., May 8, 1895.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is received, and after a careful examination of the work I unhesitatingly pronounce it one of the most impressive Freethought works ever issued from the press. It will indeed "corner the parson" and all his flock, and I shall take great pleasure in showing the book to my orthodox friends. As a reference book it is invaluable, and it should find a place in every Freethinker's library.

Respectfully, W. F. BAILEY.

When Renewing Your Subscription. Take Advantage of These Good Offers

For $6.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and S. P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" ($5). Large Octavo, 1150 pages, gilt sides and back, marbled edges—the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press. 140 Half Tone Engravings of the Prominent Freethinkers of the past four centuries.

The object of this work is to present the Course of Freethought throughout the Civilized World from the time of Columbus and Bruno to the time of Ingersoll. It is a radical Historic Record of the greatest developments of the human race. It reveals Freethought as an intellectual, moral, literary, social, industrial, and political movement. It shows what Freethought is in itself, how manifold are its influences, and with what promise we can hail its future triumph. "FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT" embraces the most illustrious pages of human history, adorned with the brightest genius, radiant with the most splendid poetry, rich with the greatest inventions and discoveries, and ennobled with freedom's most shining advance. Nothing can be more interesting or more inspiring to the pioneer workers of to-day, to those who are still in the van for human rights and progress. No Liberal can afford to be without this book. It contains the greatest thoughts and the greatest deeds of the greatest men in one harmonious and magnificent whole, a vivid picture of man's sublimest evolution, with the added glory of woman's emancipation from the chains and slavery of a barbaric church.

Darwin and After Darwin

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers: "Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. The Rising Clouds of Ecclesiasticism.

How solicitous for the welfare of others the ministers are, to be sure! They are so anxious that there be a "rest" day upon which they can self-sacrificingly toil for the salvation of the souls of those to whose bodies they deny all liberty of action. What martyrs to duty they are! Miserably perish the gross creature who would be so base as to impute to them a selfish desire to fill their churches and line their pockets by shutting every door that the people desire to enter! And they are absolutely tireless in their generous zeal; they are so devoted to the work of making the very name of Sunday a stench in the nostrils and a by-word in the mouths of free men, that we find it impossible to record their meetings, crusades, proposed legislative enactments, and judicial victories. In Hoboken the Ministers' Union is holding Sunday meetings for the purpose of bringing about "a better observance of the Sabbath." If it is simply "rest" that they are after, why this religious cant about the "observance of the Sabbath"?

In Toledo, O., Judges Haynes, Scribner, and King, composing the circuit court, on June 22d made permanent the injunction against Sunday ball playing, on the ground that the cheering made the sport a nuisance! Would these judges have held that the cheering made the playing a nuisance on the other days of the week? Would they have held that the shouting and singing of a Free Methodist camp-meeting was a nuisance? It is safe to answer both questions with an emphatic No. The dispatch has this significant addendum: "This victory by the Civic Federation is looked upon as the start of a moral crusade, the results of which may be far-reaching." Exactly, but for "moral" please read "religious and puritanic" and you have got at the kernel of this bitter nut with the deceptively promising exterior. John Wanamaker has been made president of the Philadelphia Sabbath Association. This is not surprising, but when we learn that Judge Williams of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania was elected vice-president and that he made a speech of acceptance, we wonder if he has no sense of the fitness of things. "Judge Williams pointed out that the state by its laws against blasphemy and Sabbath desecration recognizes both the name and the day of God." Can the Pennsylvania Freethinker and Jew hope for justice when the Supreme bench of the state is packed in the interest of God and Sunday? Here is a man who sees no incongruity between his duties as a judge and his belief in the righteousness of laws against "blasphemy" and "desecration of the Sabbath." Judge Williams should be a believer in the "crime" of witchcraft also; that belief could no more surely disqualify him for the high position he unfortunately holds than does his belief that there can be such a crime as "blasphemy." Perhaps he does believe in witchcraft; it would not be strange, for his Bible recognizes it and commands that the witch be put to death, and it is shown by the other superstitions he cherishes that he is medieval, if not antediluvian, in his thought.

Union of "Reform" Forces not Desirable.

There is a great deal of wholly useless lamenting over the failure of the various "reform" parties to unite for "practical" work. It is natural for the authoritarians to regret this lack of consolidation, for their wish is to impose by force their views and alleged panaceas on dissenting minorities, but why friends of liberty should waste so much breath in deploring the only condition of affairs that permits them to live in peace is inexplicable. Even Freethinkers are often found pointing to the great number of sects into which Protestant Christianity is divided as a menace to the well-being of the world, seemingly oblivious to the fact that while churchmen claim the right to dictate to the rest of the people what they shall believe, the only possible guarantee of religious freedom is the inability of the warring sects to sink their differences and work together for the extirpation of the heretic. Do not these Liberals understand that our secular Constitution would never have been if the colonial churches had not been so jealous of each other? There were at that time some clear-headed men who saw all the dangers involved in the union of church and state, but who can believe that they could have embodied their ideas in the fundamental law had it not been for the fact that each church dared not trust the others? The most ominous sign of the times today is the apparent willingness of the churches, Protestant and Catholic, to ignore creedal differences and unite upon the dogmas they hold in common, for the purpose of putting into statute law their beliefs regarding holy days, "temperance," "moral reforms," and the rest of the legislative fads of the time.

A secular newspaper, the Minneapolis Times, which is quite liberal in its policy, opening its columns to the discussion of present-day issues, says editorially:

"What is the matter?" asks the social reformer. Thousands of devoted men and women are doing their utmost to make life better. Why is there so little progress? Schools abound and also ignorance. Churches are multiplied, but there is at least as much open infidelity and as much practical irreligion as there ever was. Societies and even parties devote themselves to needed reforms, and yet pitiless and disheartening statistics show that the sum of intemperance and vice is not diminishing. Why so little harvest when there is so much ploughing and sowing of seed?"

It is to be presumed that the average "reformer" more regrets the continued "open infidelity" than he does the "practical irreligion" and the intemperance and vice. The great difficulty is that these zealous men and women do not realize that reformation, improvement, is a matter of growth; they do not know that it takes generations of slow development to effect changes for the better. They think that the most important thing to do is to organize and get a law passed. This is illustrated by the endeavors of the Sabbatarians to create and perpetuate reverence for Sunday by making the day as disagreeable as possible for multitudes of people. This explains the wasted work which so worries the Times. That paper continues:

"The crowning difficulty of difficulties is that so much work is wasted. Misdirected effort cheats us out of our millenium. If all the good men and women who are striving earnestly for better things could be brought to pull together and in the right direction, there would soon be a different world to live in. But the scattered forces become wasted forces; the million who want most earnestly a better life pull in half a million different ways, while the practical people, who serve selfish appetites or ambitions, pull all together one way."

It is fortunate indeed for the world that these good but deluded men and women do not "pull together" more closely than they do. If they should "pull together" in all things there would truly "soon be a different world to live in," but what sensible man or woman would want to live in it? It would be infinitely worse than the Dark Ages, for while man was then a slave to the priest and the king, he would now be the slave of the priest, the legislature, and the "moral reformer," the latter immeasurably the worst of the three, in that he has inherited the vices of the priest, is the "power behind the throne" of the legislator, and believes that there is no limit to the proper functions of the law-maker. The Times fails to realize that the "scattered forces" are not "wasted forces" in so far as they are educational and liberating. But they are wasted when they are used to forward schemes of invasion. And generally they are worse than wasted, for when so employed they divert attention from really practical educational work, and they alienate and antagonize the very persons who need to be set to thinking on physiological, hygienic, and ethical subjects. The Galveston News recently wittily says that the moment a man sees that you are real anxious to "reform" him, that moment you cease to have any influence with him. There is a profound psychological truth in the remark; we instinctively repel anything that appears like dictation; "self-preservation is the first law of nature," is an old saying, but few seem to realize its application in the domain of "reform." Our modern world-overturners of the kind referred to by the Times, come at the transgressor, or the supposed transgressor, with a club and then wonder why he does not at once become of their way of thinking and quit his wicked actions. Man must be reached through his intellect, or his uplifting emotions, or he is not reached at all. You cannot make him better; he is the only man who can do that. All legitimate and effective reform educates and liberates, and all working for this kind of reform labor together to one end, although they may not be federated, and the specific evils which severally inspire them to activity may have no apparent connection. On the other hand, the force moralists also work together, in that, however wide apart they may be, so far as definite measures are concerned, they are at one in their distrust of the vitalizing power of man's desire for happiness and their denial of the opportunity to grow. When one faction of the party of repression is repulsed or routed the party as a whole has been weakened, and the party of development has been correspondingly strengthened. We are thus shown how fortunate it is that the various factions of the religious world and of the force moralists are not able to thoroughly combine for the carrying out of their schemes of tyranny and spoliation. But they are getting together, and herein is the gravest danger that menaces civilization.

"The pope has just issued another of a series of appeals for the union of all the religious bodies in Christendom in a common cause against the wickedness there is in the world. Of course, only retrogression is to be expected when all the forces of progress are wasted in fighting each other."

What is the "wickedness" against which the pope wishes the Christian churches to combine? This is answered by the record of the church when it was much more nearly a unit than it is now. Heresy was the "wickedness" most dreaded, most hated, and most vigorously combated by Leo's predecessors, and later by the schismatics, who made their offshoots from Rome as nearly like the mother church in cruelty and bloodthirstiness as their comparative weakness permitted. For all genuine moral reform there is no need of the federation of the Protestant churches, nor of the Protestant and Catholic churches. Organizations working for the betterment of humanity appeal to different classes of minds, and each can do something to make the world freer and happier if it goes about it in the right way, but it is an unmitigated curse if it devotes its energies exclusively to the attempt to coerce. Under liberty, the fittest agencies of reformation will survive. But it is not liberty that the pope wants when he calls for the reunion of Christendom, and it is not liberty that the Protestants want who echo his appeal. Well-informed men know what the union of Christendom did for the world, and they know what it would do again, for Christianity is still the gospel of exclusive salvation, and it still professes to speak by authority of the omnipotent. It will take centuries to get the poison of authoritarianism out of the blood of men whose ancestors for a thousand years were taught the lessons of cruelty and persecution by priests and priest-led mothers, and until that poison has been bred and educated out it will not be safe for so-called "reformers" to "work together" the way the Times desires. Again the Minneapolis paper:

"But what is there strange in all this [slowness of 'reform'] when the churches which profess the same essential faith multiply their forms and organizations, and buildings and separate services, each with its separate cost, its half-filled pews, and, too often, its staggering debt, and, as if to excuse the waste of endeavor, spend much of their remaining force in sectarian disputes with each other? Or is it strange when friends of prison reform, marriage reform, of industrial reform, of currency reform, of public education, spend their strength rather in controversies with each other about methods than in definite effort about anything?"

The only real grievance growing out of the multiplication of churches is the increase of untaxed church property, as their adherents will do less harm otherwise when divided than when united, and equitable taxation will remove that one grievance. Touching the question of the numerous "reforms" named, it is sincerely to be hoped that the warfare over "methods" will continue until the majority of the people learn that reform does not come by statute law, but by the emancipation of faculties, and the consequent successful striving of the individual for greater prosperity and happiness. What is needed in the way of legislation is repeal, not enactment. "Progress comes but slowly," as the Times says, and that is inevitable, as every student of evolution knows. Progress must not be forced by outside powers, or reaction is sure to follow when the pressure is removed, or if the pressure is not removed, then death ensues. Will religionists and other force reformers never learn the lesson?

The Enforcement of Law "As Law."

There is an ordinance of this city which forbids the shooting of firecrackers and the use of other explosives and fireworks in the streets and about residences. These things are always a source of danger to property, person, and life. Fires are set, horses are frightened, men, women, and children are injured and killed, and the nervous and ill are shocked and made worse by the indiscriminate and careless play. Yet our police commissioners, who are straining themselves almost to death in the frantic endeavor to close saloons and delicatessen stores on Sunday, for the alleged reason that "the law must be enforced because it is law, y'know," suddenly lost their great interest in law, "as law," when confronted with the fireworks problem. For weeks before the Fourth the boys had been at work with the explosives and the downtown wholesale merchants had been obstructing the sidewalks with their dangerous goods (thus violating another law), yet Commissioner Roosevelt, after indulging in some reflections which could be construed only as a rebuke of the Board of Aldermen for adopting the fireworks ordinance, went off to Oyster Bay and left his subalterns to enforce the law or not as they might find it agreeable or convenient. How well they enforced it in their love for "law as law" is indicated by this editorial paragraph in the World of the 5th:

"If Mr. Roosevelt succeeds in enforcing the Blue Laws hereafter no better than he did the laws against explosives yesterday, he is not likely to be troubled with further complaints of pernicious activity."

The love for law "because it is law," had suddenly burned out into the ashes of "patriotism," indifferent to the comfort and lives of the citizen. There is no priesthood, no religious superstition, to back the enforcement of the fireworks ordinance. That tells the whole story. On the same subject the Times gives some convincing testimony:

"It is to be wished that the municipal ordinance prohibiting the explosion of firecrackers had attracted the attention of the Police Commissioners as a law which it was their duty to enforce. Such is unquestionably the fact, and it is equally unquestionable that no systematic attempt was made on Thursday to enforce the law. There was not a quiet precinct or even a quiet 'post' on all Manhattan Island. There was no neighborhood in which detonations, annoying except to those engaged in producing them, might not have been heard all day long at the rate of a score or more a minute, or in which a person so disposed could either work or rest in quiet."

The Times adds, what every one who remained in the city knows to be true, that the town was deserted by all who could get away, there was less life and more noise than on any previous Fourth of July, and the disturbers were left free to make all the noise they could and set the town on fire "if it should so happen."

"There is no more patriotism than there is sense in allowing the city to be made a pandemonium every year by a celebration which is simply barbarous, nor any excuse for converting a national holiday into a municipal nuisance."

And New York was permitted to be turned into a "pandemonium," through a "barbarous" performance that made a holiday a "municipal nuisance," by our model Board of Police Commissioners who are daily attitudinizing and agonizing in the desperate effort to "enforce law because it is law"! Bah! The whole business is a sickening burlesque on order, decency, and justice.

Alexander Risk.

In the old days of the "Bennett fight," when Freethought in the United States was in arms for liberty of press and mails, Iowa was not lacking in soldiers of the just cause. It was then one of the most hotly contested of the states of the Union and was always excellently represented in the congresses of the National Liberal League. It had eighteen delegates in the congress of 1880 at Chicago when the League was at the zenith of its strength and influence, and was viril and aggressive in its fight against the Comstock throttlers of liberty of expression. Its workers were at the front, and the local organizations were numerous and effective. But, alas! how those workers have fallen by the way within three years, most of them within two years, two a little earlier! The "Old Guard" is indeed gone, almost. These were all men of character, of intelligence, of unbounded devotion to and tireless enthusiasm in the work of enlightenment and liberation. Matthew Farrington and Dr. Hastings; three of the Dutton Brothers—Jerome, Leroy, Lorenzo; B. F. Gove, J. L. Tompkins, and others, and now, the latest to fall with harness on, Alexander Risk. He was by birth a son of Scotland, by intellectual conviction an uncompromising Freethinker in religion, by nature determined, impulsive and yet systematic, and generous to a degree. He was always ready to help in any enterprise that promised to advance the standard of Liberalism. He lived sixty-eight years and died at last of cancer in the stomach, a most painful disease, but kept his faith in reason and science to the end, and thus in death as he had in life testified to the sufficiency of Freethought as guide and support.

When in the night we wake and hear the rain" he wakes not "with the rain." For him there is surcease of sorrow, and his memory and his influence live with those who knew him, and bear fruit now and will bear fruit in the generations yet to be.

Anent the questions growing out of the differences of opinion concerning public education, the New York Times utters these words of wisdom: "They are questions the discussion of which demands good sense, good temper, and freedom from bigotry, and to the settlement of which neither Catholic bigots nor Protestant bigots can contribute anything of value but silence." That is just right.

"An insanity expert in a New York murder case yesterday testified that 'the unrestricted indulgence of the imagination concerning matters that are never to be realized may lead the human mind beyond the bounds of reason.'"—New York World.

Undoubtedly; an expert was not needed to tell us that. The fact explains the prevalence of insanity among the believers in heavens and hells. Probably this was what the expert had in mind, but deemed it prudent to veil his specific meaning.

Police Commissioner A. D. Andrews, of New York, says over his own signature: "We will enforce whatever Sunday laws the legislature chooses to enact." If the legislature should enact that every citizen of the state must attend church at least once each Sunday Commissioner Andrews stands pledged to enforce the law. Such is blind fetish worship! No official is under obligation to enforce a law that violates his conscientious convictions, if an official has conscientious convictions. He can resign any time and leave the law to the care of those who believe that it is just and should be enforced. Phyllis Leveridge, a school inspector, declares that Sunday is "a holy day," proclaimed such by "our Constitution." If this school inspector does not inspect the schools any more carefully than she has the Constitution, she should at once be removed.

"Again the Prohibitionists of the nation are called upon to mourn Massachusetts' loss. Brave, brainy and big-hearted Dr. A. A. Miner is gone. He was a champion that any cause might be proud to own, and a foe that evil-doers hated and feared."—New York Voice.

Dr. Miner, Universalist, and for a long time president of Tuft's College, the denominational educational institution, was also for many years a vice-president of the National Reform Association, (God-in-the-Constitution party), and his sympathies were with it to the end. Only last year, when the theocrats were pushing their Christian amendment movement in Congress, Dr. Miner sent them a letter in which he unequivocally indorsed the treasonable scheme. He is just the "champion" we should expect the Voice to eulogize, and from its commendation of him we may fairly estimate the degree of religious liberty we should enjoy under the domination of the party of which it is the most conspicuous and influential advocate.

Ex-Judge Gedney says in an interview that he thinks "the Sabbath should be respected for the sake of those who go to church, and during such hours the saloons should be closed." But why should the saloons be closed only during church hours if the desire is to respect the feelings of the church attendants? If we are to forbid people from doing as they like merely because other people do not like to have them do so, why should not places of business be closed all day Sunday? Certainly the Sabbatarians are opposed to work and business (except church work and business) at any hour during Sunday. Is not this offer to close during the hours of church service simply another attempt to dodge a plain issue? Or is it thought that many people would go to church on Sunday if the saloons and other places were not offering superior attractions? Is this the real reason why the delicatessen stores are required to close at 10 A.M.? If so, why should the city or state load the dice of one class of citizens at the expense of the others?

All that the authorities can rightfully do is to preserve order; they have no right to create the criminal disorder of enforced compliance with any particular set of opinions.

There is at least one Populist editor down in Texas who does not bow the knee to the theological Baal. Milton Park, of the Southern Mercury, of Dallas, was recently called for jury service in the federal court. When the rest of the panel stood up to be sworn, the editor kept his seat. Judge Rector asked him what he meant by such conduct. Mr. Park replied that he did not believe in the judicial oath, and would not countenance it. He would affirm, but he would not take the oath. After a little lively discussion between the judge and the editor, the latter was permitted to go back to his sanctum. We do not see what the judge meant by raising any question of the right of a juror or witness to affirm, for whether one will swear or affirm is optional under federal jurisdiction. Mr. Park simply asserted his legal and moral rights, for which all honor is due him, especially in these days of truckling subserviency to those "dressed in a little brief authority."

The Jeweler's Circular says that a London correspondent writes of an exhibition of curious old clocks which the Aquarium people have organized. Among the 2,000 collected is one made by a pious Scotchman about 150 years ago. "To guard against any possible consequences of breaking the Sabbath, he so constructed it that at midnight on Saturday it stopped dead, and never so much as ticked until Monday morning began." What a wicked creature this painfully pious Scot must have thought his God to be! God's universe is an eight-day clock, speaking after the Paley manner, and keeps ticking right along on all the holy days, including the Bible and Adventist Saturday and the Catholic and Covenanter Sunday. God was a novice, undoubtedly, in the Sabbath business; he sadly needed the coaching of Rev. Mr. Crafts and Dr. McAllister. What a pity our latter-day Sabbatarians cannot find some way to wind up the human organism so that at midnight on Saturday it will "stop dead," and never tick again until Monday morning! The great advantage of this would be that it would padlock the lips of all the ministers.

The late Illinois legislature passed a bill making it an offense against the majesty and dignity of the law for barber-shops to be open on Sunday. As to the majesty and dignity of the legislators who were responsible for this outrage, the following excerpt from the Chicago Tribune and New York Herald's reports of the closing scenes in that legislature may throw a little light:

"The members of the House and their employees got into several vicious fights, and during one of them one hundred men were out in the corridors whacking each other's heads and acting like madmen. Many persons were injured. The rioting was commenced immediately after the night session was convened, and the beer that had been brought into the committee-room and cloak-rooms began to get in its work. . . . Just before the House was finally adjourned, and while Mr. Sharrock was presenting Clerk Reeves with a diamond stud, a couple of members got mixed up in a fight near the Republican cloakroom, and made so much noise that the speech could not be heard ten feet away. When Clerk Reeves responded he was drowned out in yells and cat-calls. The motion to adjourn sine die was made by Mr. Weston, put by Speaker Meyer, and declared carried, with members yelling, whistling, throwing books, papers, wastebaskets, and everything they could lay hands on. Between drinks from beer bottles in the cloakrooms, the members of the 39th General Assembly wound up their session to-night. Bills were railroaded through whether they were good, bad, or indifferent."

There would seem to be no doubt of the ability of these men to legislate on religion, morals, and hygiene for the citizens of Illinois; no wonder Altgeld dared not either sign or veto their Puritan Sunday bill; he felt that they were representative of all that was best and most inspiring in the electorate of the state.

When the body of Dr. Buchanan, the alleged wife murderer, electrocuted at Sing Sing, was brought to New York for interment, the undertaker who had it in charge put it on exhibition in his rooms. Thousands of people, mostly women, from all classes of society, surged about the coffin and fought for a look at the mangled form. They talked and laughed, jostled against the sorrow-stricken widow, and some of the women even tried to raise her veil to stare into her tear-stained face. The police had to make a passage for her to the bier. At the grave there was another crowd of some two thousand women, who conducted themselves as they or others had done at the undertaker's rooms. They even attempted to climb into the carriage where Mrs. Buchanan sat. The New York Press, commenting on this lamentable exhibition of indecency and cruelty, says:

"It is such an instance as this that makes us aware that, different as we are in kind, our common parentage of medieval violence has not been obliterated by the Christian training of ages, that our boasted culture is merely a veneer over innate barbarism."

"The Christian training of ages"! How refining has been the setting of offenders in the pillory and stocks, the exhibitions of the civil whipping post, the flogging of sailors and soldiers, the whipping of naked Quaker women at the cart's tail through New England villages, the hanging of "witches" and Quakers on Salem Hill and Boston Common, the torturing for ages in Christian lands of accused persons and witnesses, the public execution of millions of heretics and "witches" in Germany, England, Scotland, France, and Italy, and the horrible displays of the autos da fe on the Iberian Peninsula! Verily we are still suffering the effects of "the Christian training of ages." In the face of such reversions to "medieval" Christianity it is very poor policy on the part of church apologists to call attention to the fact that Christianity so long had the training of the ancestors of the present generation in Europe and America.

"Christ advocated the use of wine, but the Prohibitionists advocate the use of water. Who is right?—The Protector (liquor trade paper), St. Louis."

"Why, you are right, of course, and the churches are all wrong. The idea that the great Presbyterian and Methodist and Baptist and other churches that teach total abstinence know as much about Christ and what he taught as the liquor dealers' leagues and the editors of ginmill papers know, is absurd on the face of it! Right? Why you must be right. The whole world looks to you as authority on biblical matters, and when you speak on such subjects, all discussion ends. The Prohibition Party will now please disband."—New York Voice.

There can be no doubt that the leaders of the various churches named know as much about the teachings of the Bible concerning temperance as do the liquor dealers' leagues, but then it is not to their interest to tell all they know, while it is to the interest of the liquor leagues to tell the truth in this matter. But the masses of the church members do not know as much about the teachings of the Bible on the liquor question as do the alert defenders of the saloon business. The Christian multitude are content to take the word of their spokesmen, who have dinned into their ears the few passages in the Bible which clearly condemn the use of intoxicants, while studiously ignoring the far greater number which commend their use. But four of the Old Testament writers unequivocally condemn wine, and these in some passages only in which they mention it, as clearly commending it in others, two of them—Isaiah and Hosea—saying more for than against. At the same time, in some of the condemnatory passages oil and meat are also denounced! Not one of the New Testament writers has clearly affirmed that intoxicating drinks are to be eschewed. On the other hand, more than a score of the Old Testament books and several of the New contain strong pro-wine assertions and injunctions. "Bible temperance" and "Bible prohibition" are frauds.

"Samuel Leppelgow sells delicatessen in upper Second avenue. His rival, Edward Fritz, of No. 1587 Second avenue, had his store open Sunday morning. Leppelgow bought a box of sardines from Mrs. Fritz, and then called Patrolman Neumann."

"The woman begged not to be arrested, and just then her husband appeared."

"Arrest me instead of her," he said.

"The policeman hesitated. 'But you didn't make the sale.'"

"Leppelgow wanted Fritz arrested, and suggested: 'You sell me a loaf of bread, and I'll make the complaint against you.'"

"The husband complied and was locked up. In Harlem court yesterday City Magistrate Crane held him in $100 bail for the grand jury."

"It is forbidden by law to sell even food after 10 o'clock Sunday morning."—New York World.

When in the freer, saner centuries to come, the people look back to this savage age in which we live, and read of such crimes as this, they will wonder why we called ourselves "free," and be silent in sheer amazement as they realize something (they can never sense it all) of our poverty of intellect and our supineness of soul. We grovel in abject cowardice in the dust of humiliation at the feet of this paper and gas fetish of statute law that we have ourselves made, or, rather, permitted political bosses and back country survivals to set up for our slavish worship. We boast loudly and rancorously of our ability to whip a federated world in arms and yet we have not the brains and pluck to throw off the chains of a hundred and twenty thousand priests and their lay dupes and political catspaws! We venerate the letter that killeth and know not the spirit that giveth life. We blindly serve phantoms as ghostly and substanceless as those on whose altars our ancestors for ages laid all that was best and most promising in the civilization of Europe. Hail, America! land where the spiritual thimble-rigger is rampant and triumphant and men and women are abased and trampled; where liberty is vanishing and the black shadow of the cross falls ever wider and darker. And how the Fourth of July declaimers did gush!

The police of this city are now required to vigorously enforce the law closing delicatessen stores at 10 A. M. on Sunday. At these places are sold bread, milk, eggs, butter, and all kinds of prepared supplies for the table. There is no pretense that they are in any sense "immoral" on other days than Sunday. They are a great convenience to the housekeeper, for she can, in any domestic emergency, step down into one and get what she may need for a meal or lunch. It is pretended by would-be deceivers that Sunday laws are wanted by them to protect the people in the enjoyment of a day of rest. Now, it is well known that in a big city a very large proportion of the population prefer to sleep very late Sunday morning, thus securing the "rest" that the Sundayites avow they are so eager for the poor to have. A great many do not get up usually until eight, nine, ten, or even later Sunday forenoon, but under the enforcement of this stupid and invasive ten o'clock closing law all will be compelled to secure their Sunday morning supplies early, thus crowding the stores, necessitating the employment of extra clerks or the overworking of the regular force, and the consequent inconvenience of the patrons. Besides this, the stores have been in the habit of opening for the accommodation of their patrons at four or five in the afternoon, if they closed in the middle of the day. Now they cannot do it. If it is desired only to give the clerks a rest, why is not the ten o'clock closing law made operative on other holidays than Sunday? Has not the employee the same right to his "rest" on the Fourth of July or Decoration Day that he has to it on Sunday? Or has he more rights on religious sacred days than he has on national holidays? The plain truth is that all this commotion about "rest" on Sunday is because of the religious superstition behind it and the clerical vested interests involved. The delicatessen stores are mostly small, generally conducted, we should judge, by their proprietors, and hence there is little question of "wage-slavery seven days in succession." The sensible and just thing to do is to take the meddling hand of the law out of these men's private business, and leave them free to close or remain open, as they individually see fit.

DURING the last week in June J. E. Rensburg held a debate at Peoria, Iowa, with Lawyer Liston McMillin, of Oskaloosa, Iowa. The proposition discussed was, "Did Jesus Christ Rise From the Dead?"

News and Notes.

Aberdeen, Scotland, is a rich and comfortable place. Orthodoxy enjoys itself here. It is in the swim. But it is no bad place for a Freethinker. With a moderate fortune and a complacent mind, one can take life as pleasantly in this northern metropolis as anywhere on the globe. Aberdeen granite is celebrated for its beauty. It has a light-some look, and as there is no smoke at Aberdeen, the stone always has a charming and cleanly appearance. The city has many noble structures, colleges, universities, hotels, etc. The church buildings are very elegant and massive. The Salvation Army warriors are in their pride and glory here. They are erecting a splendid fort of granite, and they certainly put on style, and begin to vie in magnificence with the more ancient ecclesiastical powers. They will eventually be at the height of fashion, no doubt.

Dr. Mortimer, of Turiff, was present at the lectures. He has for many years been an outspoken Freethinker in an orthodox community. It was a pleasure to meet one who has so bravely stood by his colors. On Tuesday afternoon he gave me a drive over Aberdeen in company with his son, William Mortimer, and his brother, Mr. D. A. Mortimer. I thus had an opportunity to see the renowned buildings of the city, the cathedral, King's College, and the Marischol College, also the old stone bridge, Victoria bridge, the park, harbor, etc. We visited old Aberdeen, which has, indeed, the aspect of moss-grown centuries. The modern Aberdeen is built between the rivers Don and Dee, and along its shores sweeps the great German ocean.

On Wednesday I had a delightful drive with James Mailland, William Calder, James Greig, Robert Leith, and others, to Castle Mar, past Balmoral, the Queen's Highland residence, a magnificent palace in the heart of the mountains. We first take train for Ballater, forty miles out, and then a coach eighteen miles to Braemar. The Grampian hills along this route stretch away in majestic amplitude, and valleys smile in summer glory, while above the vast woodlands are the still snow-capped peaks. I did not expect to behold such a contrast—against the splendor of summer the gleaming masses of winter's array. Along the towering Lochnagar, which Byron celebrates, dark and massive, and other lofty steepes, the white banners unfurl, while near around the glorious flowers and grass adorn the warm bosom of earth. The battle of summer and winter is still carried on among these Highlands, with blending and beautiful columns, as if somehow it were a lover's quarrel, and the seasons did not wish to part with one another. Thus in the chambers of the Highlands they mix in gentle warfare with delightful contrariety.

It is both sunshine and rain along the route. The rain is what they call in this country a "Scotch mist." It makes the journey only more enchanting, for over the peaks the clouds roll off, and a burst of sunshine contrasts with the dark environments, touching the mist with gold, so that the prospects were ever-varying, and the clouds seemed like castles in the air. Anon a brilliant rainbow would span the way, decorating the wooded heights with effulgent hues. One hung from the mountain right over Balmoral Castle as we passed along, ornamenting it as never before, and the queen, with all her untold wealth, could not have given it such a lovely embellishment, nor could she have enjoyed its luster any more than we strangers did, for our ownership was as legitimate as hers. I never saw a rainbow so close before. It seemed to drop some of its jewels at our very feet as it arched over our onward path.

Castle Mar is an old, old castle, built in 1483, and many a conflict has surged about its lofty walls. It is now occupied only by one old man, who takes care of it—a curious old man, contented in his loneliness amidst this decaying grandeur, and yet a jolly old soul, especially when the mountain-dew is sparkling. He says he wouldn't be married for all the world. He doesn't want a woman around. He can take care of himself and be perfectly independent within the walls of this solitary structure. I wandered all over this somewhat ghostly relic of the past, that looks sad and riven against the bloom of to-day. From dungeon to battlement I looked over the desolate apartments, and strange figures and scenes haunted the inquiring mind. Around the castle in the sunny grass were beautiful wild flowers, which I gathered in remembrance of this charming and melancholy spot, thrilled with the romance of so many changing ages. We took our lunch here, on the greensward, and modern politics and progress mingled their flashes with the shadowy turrets that overhung our joyous "round-table."

We then walked to Braemar, a mile away, a handsome town on the side of the mountain among the ranks of trees. It is 1,100 feet above Aberdeen, and is quite a summer resort for invalids in pursuit of pure air. The prospects extending from this lofty hamlet are varied and delightful; the hills and vales, the elegant residences; the river, or mountain brook rather, at this place; the wide meadows, the cattle and sheep, the sky above with its silver or golden clouds, and the deep blue of the immensities beyond. Through this pomp we return while the sun hastes to its setting and the long twilight begins, and at nine o'clock Aberdeen again presents itself. I was pleased to meet at this time Mr. Charles Watt Daniel, and to spend with him the remainder of the evening in the company of Mr. Mann, of the Grand Royal Hotel. Both these friends are staunch Liberals, and their companionship was one of the most entertaining of my experiences.

James Maitland, Wm. Calder, and Mr. Harkis are among the pioneer forces of Freethought in Aberdeen. They did their level best to make the lectures a success and to enable the Pilgrim to see the best that was to be seen in this part of Scotland. Mr. Harkis presided at the first meeting and Mr. Maitland at the second, and the audiences on both evenings gave me a cheery welcome. There was some kind of a discussion after the lectures, but it did not amount to much, for the reason that no salient points were discussed, and the defenders of the faith ran off into individual idiosyncrasies that had no bearing upon the general question. It is pretty difficult to keep the Christians to parliamentary rules. Aberdeen friends have enriched the campaign with one of the most enjoyable of my experiences.

Dundee is next on the list, somewhat larger than Aberdeen, having, I understand, about 160,000 inhabitants. It has not the brilliant appearance of Aberdeen, for the stone of which it is built is of a darker hue, and the smoke of factories hangs over it. I am welcomed to the hospitable home of Wm. McLean, who lives, and has his home and workshop, on an eminence in the suburbs of the city, and from there a fine view can be obtained of the surrounding country. Mr. McLean and Mr. J. F. Gloak meet me at the station, and the moment I strike their company I know I am in good hands. The audiences at Dundee are not so large as those at Aberdeen, but they are appreciative, and heartily welcome the American visitor. Mr. Gloak presides the first evening, and Mr. Sturton the second evening. A rambling discussion occurs after the lectures, but I found it pretty difficult to get hold of the ideas presented. They were cloudy and far-fetched. Indeed, I could hardly discover if there were any ideas at all, the words being so voluminous and the sentences involved. However, one genial critic I did understand—Mr. Scott, who is a Swedenborgian, and made some very sensible observations, in harmony with the general matter of my lecture, though from a different point of view, but with entirely friendly feeling, all of which is acceptable to the comprehensive Freethinker. Altogether, I enjoyed the lectures at Dundee. I liked the people I met, and am sure that, at another time, I shall have a much larger attendance. The summer weather is not favorable for good audiences. People like to be outdoors and enjoy the fresh air and beautiful scenery, and it takes quite a motive power to get them inside of four walls.

Dundee has many attractions. Among the chief are the Tay river and the Tay Bridge. The Tay is a broad, magnificent river nearly two miles wide as it flows by Dundee. The bridge over this river is the longest bridge in the world—about two miles. It is a massive structure, built for the centuries, to defy wind and tide. The piers of the old bridge are still to be seen, a melancholy remembrance. The old bridge was itself a great feat of engineering, but it was too narrow, and the railroad directors too economical, and one bright moonlight night, when the wind was blowing a perfect gale, just as the train rolled on, the structure toppled over and all on board were plunged into the river with the crashing timbers. Not one was saved. The new bridge is broader, with more massive piers, and a like accident will never occur. On Friday morning, with Mr. McLean and Mr. Gloak, I took the train over the bridge to East Newton, one of the elegant suburbs of Dundee, across the river, where it costs money to live. The views up and down the river as we crossed the mighty bridge were splendid in their variety, the waters spreading like a lake, the bonnie banks and braes, the far hills, blue and towering in the summer sky, while the clouds swept overhead. In the afternoon, with my two comrades and Mr. Cameron, we secured a "machine" and traveled into the ample country, climbing vast hills and beholding wide expanses. In this country they call a carriage or wagon a "machine," a new name to me. I didn't hear it in England, so I guess it is pure Scotch. At any rate, the "machine" did good service, and we went on a wide rambling excursion all the afternoon. We rose hundreds of feet above the river Tay, whose spreading waters seemed to be rolling from the heart of the mountains that lifted their massive fronts along the horizon. We traveled through forest glades, by great fields of green and yellow, a million buttercups besprinkling the grass. We pass by ancient houses, thatched cottages, the stately Insane Asylum appearing like a palace on a majestic height, and the school-house where the happy children shouted after our retreating machine, and the schoolmaster of Goldsmith's pages looked after us with dazed expression, and it may be "with words of learned length and thundering sound." It was a delightful drive. It seemed as if we were riding in a balloon, so lofty were some of the hills that we ascended. When the horse dashed along with extra liveliness, it seemed as if the "machine" had wings like one of the old dragons. At length we came to a most ancient church. Nobody knows how old it is. There is a tower in Dundee which dates, they say, from the seventh century, and perhaps the church does the same. Near the door is still inserted the old iron circlet which they once put around the neck of the rogue and heretic, and there he must endure the scoffs of the pious churchgoers. Inside there is a dusky and medieval appearance, with paintings on the wall, the stone altar, etc. I placed my name on the book—for no more can the old church crush the Infidel. The sunlight of to-day is triumphant, and over the almost forgotten graves are blooming the blue and golden flowers.

We have a mighty good appetite when we return to Dundee, and Mrs. McLean spreads for us the hospitable table. After the lecture that evening, we have a jolly company at Mr. McLean's house, and I have a right good experience of Scottish life, such as we see glowing in the pages of Burns. The Scotch are a happy people, or else they never could have produced the poetry of this glorious bard.

It strikes one at first that the Scotch must be a solemn people, seeing they take so readily to Calvinism in their religious proclivities. But Calvinism is offset by whisky. I don't wonder the Scotch drink whisky. Any man who believes in the doctrines of Calvin must drink whisky in order to make life endurable. It is noticeable that as Calvinism disappears so does the much drinking of whisky. The Scotch are a temperate people so far as I can see, and there is a strong movement in favor of teetotalism. Many of our Freethought friends are disposed that way.

I am trying to learn the Scotch language, but I haven't got the hang of it yet. It takes a practiced ear. The real old Scotch songs were sung at our last gathering, and they have a humor, a pathos, and a musical ring that are charming. The heart of Scotland beats to the rhythms of nature. Her dark religion cannot destroy the joys of human fellowship. "Auld Lang Syne" closed an evening of song and cheer; and long live the remembrance of this happy occasion! Scotland is Bonnie Scotland and no mistake; and Calvinism has forever lost its grip. The heather blooms upon its loneliest crags, and so will reason and Freethought make glorious its humblest cottage.

Farewell to Dundee; and now Edinburgh, a great, busy, tumultuous, magnificent city, is about me, and it seems like a dream that I am in this historic place. Whose heart has not glowed at the name of Edinburgh? I arrived yesterday, Saturday. I was met at the station by Mr. John F. Dewar. The first thing I saw as I stepped forth from the station was the vast and famous castle on the hill. There is nothing in the world like it for magnificence and grandeur. Around its base are the public gardens, beautiful to behold. I saw also the marvelous monument to Sir Walter Scott, perhaps the most truly artistic and sublime monument ever erected to human genius. The first thing I did after tea was to mount one of the circular tramways and ride all over the great city with Mr. Dewar and others. Edinburgh is built on seven hills, and the views from its exalted streets are extensive and superb, like what we see in San Francisco. I am reminded somewhat of San Francisco as I climb these splendid hills, although Edinburgh has not the luminous appearance of the city of the Golden Gate. There is a deal of ancient solemnity about this capital of Scotland. However, I have caught but glimpses of it so far. I lecture to-day, Sunday, June 16th, afternoon and evening, and, after a season of sight-seeing, I shall have more to write. I must pencil these notes at odd chances, for I have to spend most of the days looking about, and photographing on my brain the many and glorious pictures of this memorable land.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Edinburgh, June 16, 1895.

The Deathbed Repentance of an Infidel.

I was the son of a Revolutionary soldier; was born in the year eighteen hundred. I was strictly educated in the M. E. church. I joined the church at eighteen and joined the Genessee conference of that church in about 1827 or 1828, and traveled several years in that conference. Observing the various notions or opinions and dispositions of both preachers and people, my mind was led frequently to reflect, and the query often confronted me whether God made them as he wanted them or not. Being well acquainted with the business of making men, with infinit attributes and infinit power, the question naturally presented itself why he did not make them as he wished them to be. I could see no reason why he did not. These questions, although not having a serious effect on my mind, occasionally troubled me, and the various doctrines of men I thought could not be exactly as he wished, and I could not see why they were not, inasmuch as he himself was the great proprietor of all things and could have told them exactly what was true, and that if he wanted them to know, it would have been but a small matter to tell them. These, with other thoughts and reflections, occasionally produced considerable disturbance in my mind. I was troubled to such an extent, that in a few years I located; not with a design of relinquishing my doctrines, but I did not feel at liberty to eat the people's bread and indulge in any doubts of the untruthfulness of all I was called to preach. Before I was located, however, I was in a company of friends, one of whom was a New School Presbyterian minister. In the course of conversation I took the opportunity to inquire of him as to the difference between the New and Old School Presbyterians. He said, "They have the same confession of faith, but differ in the interpretation." I asked him whether it was on the government of the church or the theological doctrines thereof. He answered, "It is on the interpretation of the doctrine of predestination." I asked him if the New School rejected the doctrine of predestination. He said, "No, but they have a different way of interpreting it." I said to him, "Do you think that your interpretation is what the original authors intended to express?" He made no direct reply, but commenced some observations to evade the question as soon as he could, and said, "but that predestination is true there can be no doubt. I pity the man, I pity you, if an assassin were to shove his dagger to the heart of your wife to-night, if you could not see the hand of the Lord in it." I replied, "I should see the hand of the devil in it. Has God and the devil gone into partnership? If so, it must be a new firm." That ended the conversation.

Having located, I gave wider range to my thoughts. One day a man put into my hand a pamphlet, entitled "An Interesting Narrative of the Loss of the Wesleyan Missionaries to the West India Islands." I sat down and read it and closed with a feeling as though a dagger had been thrust through me. The event was in substance as follows: The Methodist conference of London had met, and after organization the chairman announced to the conference that the missionary board had determined to send ten missionaries to the West India Islands, and expected him to appoint the men, but that as he did not care to exercise that prerogative, he had made up his mind that he would ask in the conference for volunteers, and accordingly said to the ministers that whoever felt in duty bound to go into the work could hand in their names before or at the missionary anniversary, occurring during the session of the conference. During the interim the required number was made up. In a few days the anniversary meeting was held. The speeches made and the appeals for the help of competent men in the Lord's vineyard had produced such an effect on the very large congregation, that when they came to make appeals for contributions for that special mission, the collection in money and the pledges amounted to the enormous sum of $50,000. At the close of the speaking the voluntary missionaries were called forward. Their experience was asked for and they were examined in doctrines. They then proceeded to ordain the missionaries by laying on of hands, and the large congregation was asked to unite for a certain length of time in silent prayer, at the close of which several ministers in succession led in vocal prayer, under, as it was thought, the special presence and favor of Almighty God. So the meeting ended. These missionaries were some of them men of families. The missionary board immediately made preparations for carrying into effect their designs as to the mission, and hence chartered a vessel and provided all necessities for the transportation of the missionaries to their destination. The time of departure soon arrived, and they set sail. All went well, and they reached an island of the West Indies, where they landed to secure a pilot, as the coral reefs were so many and so dangerous, some not reaching to the surface of the water, that such assistance was needed. Tornados being frequent in those waters, and the weather not being favorable, they were advised to remain until the appearances were more promising. They stopped for three days. The weather appearing more favorable, and having only about sixty miles to go to reach their destination, they started. They came near enough to enable them to see persons walking on the beach, expecting every minute to reach the shore. A cloud having appeared, suddenly the wind rose, and a tornado developed. Their vessel was driven on to one of those coral reefs. The bow of the vessel rose, the stern creaked, and the waves dashed over and filled the cabins, forcing the people on deck. With nothing save the clothes they had on, no provisions from their abundant supply, the vessel full of water, they resorted to prayer. They organized prayer-meetings, and had prayer on deck three times each day. With nothing to protect them from the rays of the scorching sun, nothing to eat, nothing to drink, forced to lodge together on deck, men, women, and children, sailors and missionaries, they soon began to starve. Women wept over their famishing children, with cries to heaven for relief. Men, with eyes upturned to heaven, besought God, reminding him of his promise that he would not leave nor forsake them. They continued to pray and starve, what were left of them, until the eighth day. On the eighth day a gentleman on shore picked up a prospect glass, swept it over the waters, and discovered the hulk of a vessel. He called attention to it. A boat was manned, and immediately a party went to the ship. On their arrival they found but one person alive; that was a woman, the wife of one of the missionaries. She was so exhausted as to be speechless. Timely aid restored her, and she was the author of this narrative.

When I read the account of that ill-fated ship, the question of the existence of a God was presented to my mind with unusual force. How there could be a God, infinite in love and mercy, all-powerful and everywhere present, and therefore with that ship all the time, and yet could not or would not hear and answer those heart-rending cries, to me was unaccountable. It was enough to break, as is said, "the heart of stone." How it could longer be said, "His tender mercies are over all his works," was beyond explanation. Not only that, but what effect would that have on the church at home? What effect on the contributors of that $50,000 to support and extend what they thought the cause of God?

How any thinking, reasoning man who is acquainted with this circumstance, can have any confidence in missionary work, is unexplainable. But if people would only remember that God is everywhere, with the heathen as well as the civilized, and if so disposed could, that being the one thing needful, convert them without the expense of missionaries, it would have saved the people's money and the lives of that missionary group. Why he should not convert the heathen without preachers is strange, to say the least, if his love for them is infinite.

Leaving the question of foreign missionary work, we come to some nearer home. A Disciple preacher called upon me one day and introduced himself as one educated at a college in Kentucky, and after graduating for the ministry had graduated at a law school. After practicing law for five or six years, he gave that up for the ministry. He was then holding a protracted meeting in our town. I had said nothing until this time. I then said: "Mr. Thornberry, I have never been much acquainted with your class of people. I suppose they are orthodox in reference to the existence of a soul and the fall of man?" He said, "Yes." Said I, "Mr. Thornberry, where did you get your soul?" He replied, "God created a great mass of spirit substance, and when a child is born, with its first breath it inhales a portion of that substance as its soul." I remarked: "If all men fell in Adam, that great mass of spirit substance must have been in Adam when he fell." He seemed a little nonplussed, and I left that there and proceeded to ask: "Mr. Thornberry, you have been a lawyer and, of course, are supposed to understand my question. You know that in our Constitution is a clause prohibiting the passage of a bill of attainder? What do you understand by a bill of attainder?" He replied, "It is an old English law that attainted the blood of an offender so as to subject the family to penalties with the offender. If the penalty was confiscation of goods, the whole family was impoverished, if banishment, the whole family was banished, if disfranchisement, none of the sons were voters." I asked, "Mr. Thornberry, why was that prohibited by our Constitution?" He replied, "Because of its manifest injustice." "Well, Mr. Thornberry, I suppose you hold with the other denominations that all men fell in Adam and became liable to pains and penalties in consequence? What was that but a bill of attainder, which you say is so manifestly unjust?" He arose, took out his watch, and said he was engaged for dinner at the next house, that it was about that time, and that he would be obliged to go, else he would be glad to stay longer.

At another time, I was invited to stop over night with a Dunkard preacher. During the evening he showed a disposition to talk about a people he called "No-soulists." Understanding him to imagine that I belonged to them, I told him there were such a people living beyond me, but that I was not one of them, but said, "I suppose there is no harm in talking about that a little?" "No," he replied. "Then," I said, "I suppose you think you have a soul?" "Yes." "Well, where did you get it?" He studied a little and replied, "I believe the soul is a part of God." "All right; then, of course, I am at liberty to make a few inferences? The first is, If the soul is a part of God, a part of God can sin, and hence a part of God can be displeased with a part of himself. What do you say to that?" "Well," said he, "I will think of that," and at once diverted the conversation.

I stopped over night with another friend. On lighting me to bed, and when about leaving the room, he said: "Pickard, the difficulty with your kind of folks is, you are always tearing down and never building up anything." "My friend," I said, "You have an old rickety barn out here. If you designed building a new and good barn, right where that one stands, would you build it on top of that old one, or would you first remove the old one?" He smiled and turning said, "Good night!"

On another occasion an old Methodist preacher and doctor came along the sidewalk where I was, stopped, and we spoke to each other. I said to him: "Doctor, I want to ask you a theological question. You are aware that we hold that the soul is material and mortal substance. Doctor, did your soul always exist, or had it a beginning?" He replied: "I suppose it had a beginning." "Did it begin when Adam's did, or since?" "Probably since." "Then," I said, it must have begun by direct creation or derivation." "Well, it began by direct creation as much as anything Almighty God ever made. Then he must have created it about the time your body was formed?" "Yes." Looking him in the face to judge of his age, I said: "Then God created your soul about sixty five years ago?" "Yes." "If so," said I, "did it fall in Adam?" He at once started, said he was on his way to see a patient, and would be obliged to go.

I went to hear a Disciple minister deliver a lecture on the Bible. He had a good deal to say about the soul and the devil. On the morning following the lecture, I called upon him at his hotel, and was introduced to him by the landlord. After a friendly salutation, I said to him: "I heard your lecture last evening, and a few questions arose in my mind which I thought I would like to propose to you if you have no objections. You made frequent mention of the soul. I would like to ask you whether your soul always existed or had it a beginning?" He answered: "It always existed." "Then," said I, "It is contended by mental philosophers, that the mental faculties inhere in the soul and constitute the faculties of our education. If yours has always existed, it has had a long time for learning. Can you tell me something you learned eight or ten thousand years ago?" He replied, that he had perhaps answered impromptu, and would ask the privilege of taking his answer back. "Then," said I, "You are at liberty to make such answer as you see fit. When did it begin to exist?" He answered: "When Adam's did." "Then your soul in some six thousand years old; that is quite a time in which to educate oneself. Could you tell me anything you learned, say a hundred years ago?" He then replied, "I must beg to retract that." I said all right, all we ask is facts. He rejoined: "My soul probably began about the time of the formation of my body." Said I, "Did it then fall in Adam six thousand years ago?" Some persons in the room smiled, but he said nothing. I then asked, if he could tell me who made the devil? He replied, "God made the devil, but he made himself a devil." I asked him, "Where was he, when he made himself a devil?" He dropped his head and said nothing.

The Cause in Washington and Oregon.

That dauntless worker for the dethronement of superstition, John Gronow, finding the cause here at Port Townsend, Wash., at low-water mark, determined to give it a new impetus, and with the aid of the ever genial, generous-hearted Liberal, John Ifland, the popular boniface of the Central Hotel, arranged for lectures, and they together bore the whole expense of hall rent, advertising, entertaining, and liberally remunerating the lecturer. The attendance at the lectures was good, under the circumstances, increasing each evening; the last evening was very enthusiastic and appreciative. But many liberals are slaves to Mrs. Grundy.

There is no reason why there should not be a Secular Sunday-school organized. There are a large number of Liberals who need only to get together a few times and cultivate vertebrae. The women would most gladly co-operate. A woman lecturer could rally all the scattered forces, visit for a few days around among the interested ones, arouse the enthusiasm of the women and children, and the Secular Sunday-school would be an assured success.

The immense untaxed landed possessions and institutions of the Catholics in Vancouver, Wash., give the "mother church" great influence, while her Protestant daughters rival her and vie with each other in bigotry and intolerance. Their united efforts would make the beautiful little city a hotbed of fanaticism but for the leavening influence of some of the gallant boys in blue at the garrison and a few large-hearted, broad-minded citizens like Mr. and Mrs. Charles Cushing, who, despite all opposition, or attempts at ostracism, have courage to express their convictions, and live such lives of integrity, purity and practical benevolence as to compel the esteem and confidence of all classes.

Interest in the cause has been nursed and revived here through the earnest devotion to its principles, the noble example, the self-sacrificing efforts of that stalwart and most highly esteemed young soldier of the garrison, William Bawalda. He has been ably seconded by his comrade, the clever press correspondent, A. Scltenberjer. They are deeply interested in the Portland Sunday-school, and resolved, despite the seeming utter hopelessness of any such endeavor, to have a Secular Sunday-school at Vancouver. They were fortunate in enlisting the sympathy and co-operation of that highly-gifted "Hypatia of Oregon," Miss Nettie A. Olds, pastor of the First Secular Church of Portland. She visited Vancouver, lectured, sang, played violin and piano, recited, won the admiration of all, the respect of mothers and the love of the children. She organized a Secular Sunday-school, and its rapid and continuous growth, alike in interest and membership, testifies to her efficiency and wondrous magnetic influence.

Meetings of the First Secular church of Portland are held every Sunday evening at Labor Council Hall, corner of Front and Stark street, Portland. (Sunday-school at 11 A.M.) Since the present pastor has taken charge she has succeeded in attracting the most intelligent and reputable of Portland's citizens, and two-thirds of the audience are women.

After a most interesting and admirably-rendered program of songs and recitations—including vocal and instrumental duet by Miss Olds and Oregon's peerless daughter of song, Miss Faith Youmans—Miss Olds delivered a very interesting lecture on the "Rights of Children." The lecturer is a young woman of about twenty years of age, of commanding presence, symmetrical form, and graceful carriage, with no claim to doll-baby prettiness, but when interested in her subject she is really handsome, and exerts a wondrously winsome influence, holding her audience in rapt attention, and by the force of her logic carries conviction to those who prove able to resist her eloquence. She is very young to fill so onerous a position; of course she has much to learn, has faults of delivery to overcome, but she is a priceless acquisition to our cause and has a most bright and promising future. An accomplished musician and vocalist, a born school teacher, with genuine love of children, and a gentle, modest, sympathetic nature, it is not surprising that she is so idolized by the children and loved and esteemed by every member of the church.

I have just received a letter from that redoubtable opponent of priestcraft and champion of Free-thought, C. E. Reynolds, of Tillamook, informing me that our ever faithful co-worker, Mrs. A. E. Barker, is there and succeeded in organizing a Secular Sunday-school in Tillamook and another at Fairview, about three miles from there. The following is from the Tillamook Headlight:

Mrs. A. E. Barker, who has been lecturing at the court house recently, shows herself to be a woman of good education, varied attainments, and a deep student of ancient history and modern science. Her manner is womanly, and it is evident from her earnestness and devotion that her religion is "Humanity." Those who disagree with her on her views of religion must admit that she was fair and her arguments convincing. No church member could take offense at what she said, and those who are Liberal in belief greatly appreciated her course of lectures.

The Seventh Annual Convention of the Oregon State Secular Union will be held at Portland, Oregon, on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, Sept. 20, 21, 22, 1895.

The members of the Portland Church and Women's Auxiliary extend invitation to all good workers and true friends of the cause to the hospitality of their homes.

Morning and afternoon sessions mainly devoted to study, discussion, and adoption of best means to achieve our aims and objects. Evenings, popular speakers, vocal and instrumental music, dramatic performance, etc.

All on deciding to attend will please notify the secretary so that suitable quarters may be insured.

Historical Christianity a Fraud.

The learned French Jesuit, Jean Hardouin, announced his conviction two hundred years ago that all the writings of the Christian fathers were modern forgeries.

Prof. Edwin Johnson, of London, without the knowledge of Hardouin's work, has come to the same conclusion. And now he has translated the Jesuit's posthumous book, intending to publish it with notes.

But Professor Johnson has gone a long stride farther than Hardouin. The Jesuit was bound to maintain the genuineness and antiquity of the New Testament. He alleged that no manuscripts, except of the holy scriptures, were more than four hundred years old—i. e., not older than A.D. 1329. Professor Johnson says the manuscripts of the New Testament are not older than the other monkish fabrications, if as old.

Hardouin claimed that the New Testament was first written in Latin. Professor Johnson thinks so too, and finds evidences of clumsy translation into Greek; but he maintains that both the Latin and the Greek codices are modern forgeries.

For several years past we have doubted the antiquity of some portions of the New Testament, particularly the story of the crucifixion under Pontius Pilate. And now we have from the London professor an abstract of the Moslem scriptures, which he claims to be earlier than the New Testament by at least three hundred years, and earlier than the Old Testament by at least one hundred years. The Moslem Chronicle, confected about the year 900, begins with Adam and comes down to Mohammed. It contains the story of Isa, the son of Mariam, begotten by Gabriel in the guise of her young cousin Yussuf, a carpenter in the temple where she was cloistered by the priest Zachariah, Yussuf's uncle. Mariam took her babe to Egypt, accompanied by Yussuf, where they lived together thirty years. Returning to Palestine Isa wrought miracles. He offended his people, and they obtained an order from King Herod to seize and slay him. Pontius Pilate is not mentioned. The mob prepared to crucify Isa. By divine interposition he was spirited away heavenward, and the leader of the mob, Isoua, was miraculously changed to look like Isa. In spite of his protestations they killed their own leader and bound him to the stake prepared for Isa.

Mariam, believing that her son was crucified, came and mourned at the foot of the stake for seven successive nights. On the eighth Allah caused Isa to come down from heaven to comfort his sorrowing mother. The same night seven of the apostles of Isa met him at Mariam's house. Yahya, the son of the late temple priest Zachariah, was also there. Yahya answers to John the Baptist, but he was not beheaded by King Herod until after the ascension of Isa. Of the absent apostles one, not named, had betrayed Isa, and in repentance for the deed had slain himself. Another, Simeon, had denied his master.

Isa sent forth the apostles to preach. To Greece and Rome he sent Paul and Peter. (But Peter was not Simeon or Simon who denied his master; and if Paul wrote the epistles attributed to him he never met any of the Apostles in the lifetime of Isa, and never saw Isa except as a phantom.) To Babylon Isa sent Thomas; to Kairouan, Philip; to Ephesus, John; and to the Hedjaz, toward Magreb, Bartholomew. James and Yahya were to remain at Ailia, called in modern times Jerusalem.

Then Isa prayed Allah to raise him to heaven, and to-day, says the Moslem Chronicle, the heretics

(i. e., followers of the prophet Isa, A.D. 900) celebrate, as a feast, the night when Isa descended and went up again into heaven.

King Herod treated James and Yahya kindly. Isa's mother died six months after his ascension. Yahya was beheaded by order of the same Herod, when in a drunken orgie, at the demand of his mistress, the daughter of his wife or of her sister. The head of Yahya spoke and reproved the sobered king. Then came an invasion by the King of Persia on account of the murder of the two prophets, Isa and Yahya. Seventy thousand inhabitants of Ailia were massacred and the temple and city destroyed.

The Moslem scriptures may be as false as our own. The question is, which is the older? Professor Johnson holds that the Hebrew literature is all modern, originating in the South of Europe. We cannot commend the works of Professor Johnson too highly, namely, "Antiqua Mater" (1887), "Rise of Christendom," and "Pauline Epistles."

ANTICHRIST.

Mrs. Besant's New God.

Divines declared evil to be a mystery. But skeptics retorted that this was only a confession of ignorance, and did not help in the least. It left the problem unsolved, and calling it by a grand name did not make it a bit plainer. Besides the "mystery" was, after all, quite artificial; it was really no more than a flat contradiction between the theory of "God" and the facts of nature. When this point was pressed home, the theologians saw that they must somehow prove that evil is really good; and thus they reached the serene quackery of ultimate optimism, declaring that discord is misunderstood harmony, that a man groaning with the toothache is unconsciously sounding his note in the symphony of universal happiness. This theory still holds the field, only it is modified by a "wrinkle" borrowed from evolution. Evil is not exactly good, the divines tell us, but it is good in the making; and when we get to the end of the process (if we ever do!) we shall look back, like Jehovah upon his six days' creation, and pronounce it all "good." Of course the argument is based upon prophecy; it is like paying an account with a very long bill, due sometime after death or forty days after the millennium. Still, it serves the purpose; the Micabers of theology exclaim, "Thank God, that's settled!" And the Micaber family is large, and Mrs. Besant is one of them. She meets her difficulties in relation to evil by resorting, not to the vindication of the day of judgment, but to the final disclosures of reincarnation. We shall, not, however, follow her into that region, but stick to the prosaic world of things as they are now—the world of actual experience, of more or less exact knowledge, and of more or less approximate logic.

Let us examine Mrs. Besant's theory of the function of pain, apart from its apparatus and jargon of Theosophy:

By pain we learn when we have struck against a law, and the law which pierced us when we opposed it becomes our strength when we place ourselves in harmony with it. By pain we learn to distinguish between the eternal and the transitory, and so to strike our heart-roots into that which endures. By pain we develop strength, as the athlete develops muscle by exercising it against opposing weights. By pain we learn sympathy, and gain power to help those who suffer. Thus only is the Christ-soul developed and at length perfected, and when this is once realized pain is no longer grievous nor an enemy, but a sternly gracious friend, whose hands are full of gifts.

Now, we entirely dissent from this philosophy, which appears to us the very reverse of the truth. "Adversity," says George Meredith, "tries us; it does not nourish us." Mrs. Besant has mistaken the trial for the nourishment. A child does not grow strong in darkness, privation, and suffering; it grows strong in sunlight, plenty, and happiness. When adversity comes, it does not give strength; it only tests the strength that has been acquired in prosperity. We do not deny that pain is useful in one way, as a warning against danger. But the danger is itself an evil, the proof being that we try to avoid it; and the usefulness of the warning depends on our ability to shun the danger. There is no use at all in pain when a little child falls against the fire and is burnt in its helplessness, nor is there any use in pain when a man is cremated alive because he differs from other people on religious questions;

Mrs. Besant draws a fallacious analogy between the athlete and the sufferer. In the first place, the athlete does not suffer; generally speaking, he takes a pleasure in his exercises and performances. In the next place, no man gains any strength from bearing pain, although he may gain strength by exerting himself against the causes of pain. In the third place, the very idea of an athlete is activ, while the very idea of a sufferer is passiv. Man is the victim of pain, and if he bears it willingly, in a spirit of self-sacrifice, he bears it for the sake of some other victim.

Certainly we learn sympathy by pain. But that is only one illustration of a general law—that we learn sympathy by experience. And the very fact that there is such a strong tendency to associate sympathy with suffering shows how pain and weakness have predominated in human experience. There are a hundred persons ready to help a child when it is in distress for one who will play with it and enter into its child-life. The sympathy of delight is far rarer than the sympathy of sorrow.—G. W. Foote, in London Freethinker.

Man, Government, and the Sabbath.

A reverend friend, in a private letter to the World, says: "I do feel that you are fighting the very cause you have at heart—the cause that makes me love you and applaud you so often—when you fight the Sabbath." He insists that there is less reason for closing other business places than for closing saloons on the Sabbath, protests against disregard of the "divine law" on the subject, and against the effort to "destroy the Sabbath as an American institution after the command of the Lord."

We are not putting a straw in the way of the observance of any religious holiday by anybody in accordance with his own understanding of the divine law. But we are opposed to his using our government to impose such observance upon other people who have a different understanding of divine law and human duty.

Ours is not a theocratic government. It was not founded to enforce divine laws transcribed from the Jewish Bible, the New Testament, the Koran, or any other volume the divine authority of which is an article of religious faith. It was founded to establish "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people" of all creeds or no creeds. It was not and is not clothed with authority to determine which creed has divine sanction, and to enforce it, either as to the Jewish Sabbath of the Old Testament Commandments or as to the Lord's Day instituted by Constantine's edict, without any authority from the Old Testament or the New.

The intention of its framers was that our government should leave each individual conscience perfectly free and unconstrained in such matters and serve only as a machine for enforcing the will of the people in matters pertaining strictly to secular government. It does not prevent a voter from being influenced by his religious creed in estimating the good or bad moral effect of a law, but Congress and the state legislatures are all forbidden by constitutional restrictions to assume divine authority over religious questions, to use government authority in upholding any religious belief or compelling any religious observance, imposing unequal burdens on any religious belief, or discriminating against those who profess it.

As to the argument that Sunday cannot be made a day of secular rest without making it impossible for the families of the poor to have a pitcher of beer on Sundays, there is just as much in that as in the argument that there must be no cooking, no shaving, no carriage-driving, no mail-carrying, no riding in cars or steamboats, no purchase of bread or milk on Sunday. Some kinds of business must be stopped on Sunday if it is to be a day of rest for the poor and dependent. Some other kinds of business or work cannot be stopped on Sunday without making it a day of practical imprisonment and penance to the masses. And one of these is the business of supplying the people on holidays with the necessities of life and the refreshments they are accustomed to on other days, and which they must do without on Sunday if they are not to be had fresh on that day.

A mass meeting of the State Democracy of this city lately adopted sensible resolutions touching the excise laws. It declared the Sunday-closing clause to be a violation of personal right and a law totally out of harmony with the customs, habits, and opinions of the majority in this city. It took measures to impress all our senators and assemblymen with the necessity for the repeal of this Puritanical statute. This is good sense. Meanwhile the German-American Reform Union has appealed to the Police Commissioners for a more liberal construction of existing law. The State Democracy's program is best. Laws in contravention of the just rights of the people ought to be repealed, and the fact that New York is not a rural village ought to be recognized even by hayseed legislators who have no scruple about violating the whole Decalog by their own conduct so long as they can win votes by posing as champions of the American Sabbath.—N. Y. World.

"When in the Night We Wake and Hear the Rain."

[Not since "Thanatopsis" has there before been written so artistic, so restful, so beautiful a nature poem as this. Such is our opinion. In its spirit, in its plan, in its expression, it is well-nigh perfect. There is not in it the faintest touch of superstition. Mr. Robert Burns Wilson surely has received from the great Scottish bard much more than the first parts of his name. "When in the Night we Wake and Hear the Rain" will take its place as a classic beside Bryant's beautiful and hitherto unapproached production, and will find its way into all collections of worthy poems, whether of America alone or of the whole world.—Ed. T. S.]

When in the night we wake and hear the rain
Like myriad merry footfalls on the grass,
And, on the roof, the friendly, threatening crash
Of sweeping, cloud-spied messengers that pass
Far through the clamoring night; or loudly dash Against the rattling windows; storming, still
In swift recurrence, each dim-streaming pane,
Insistent that the dreamer wake, within,
And dancing in the darkness on the sill—
How is it, then, with us—amidst the din,
Recalled from Sleep's dim, vision-swept domain,
When in the night we wake and hear the rain?

When in the night we wake and hear the rain,
Like mellow music, comforting the earth;
A muffled, half-elusive serenade,
Too softly sung for grief, too grave for mirth;
Such as night-wandering fairy minstrels made
In fabled happier days; while far in space
The serious thunder rolls a deep refrain,
Jarring the forest, wherein Silence makes Amidst the stillness her lone dwelling place—
Then in the soul's sad consciousness awakes
Some nameless chord, touched by that haunting strain,
When in the night we wake and hear the rain.

When in the night we wake and hear the rain,
And from blown casements see the lightning sweep
The ocean's breadth with instantaneous fire,
Dimpling the lingering curve of waves that creep
In steady tumult—waves that never tire
For vexing, night and day, the glistening rocks,
Firm-fixed in their immovable disdain
Against the sea's alternate rage and play—
Comes there not something on the wind which mocks
The feeble thoughts, the foolish aims that sway
Our souls with hopes of unending gain—
When in the night we wake and hear the rain?

When in the night we wake and hear the rain
Which on the white bloom of the orchard falls,
And on the young, green wheat-blades, nodding now,
And on the half-turned field, where thought recalls
How in the furrow stands the rusting plow,
Then fancy pictures what the day will see—
The ducklings paddling in the puddled lane,
Sheep grazing slowly up the emerald slope,
Clear bird-notes ringing, and the droning bee
Amongst the lilac's bloom—enchanted hope—
How fair the fading dreams we entertain,
When in the night we wake and hear the rain!

When in the night we wake and hear the rain
Which falls on summer's ashes, when the leaves
Are few and fading, and the fields forlorn
No more remember their long-gathered sheaves,
Nor aught of all the gladness they have worn;
When melancholy veils the misty hills
When somber autumn's latest glories wane;
Then goes the soul forth where the sad year lays
On summer's grave her withered gifts, and fills
Her urn with broken memories of sweet days—
Dear days which, being vanished, yet remain,
When in the night we wake and hear the rain.

When in the night we wake not with the rain—
When Silence, like a watchful shade, will keep Too well her vigil by the lonely bed
In which at last we rest in quiet sleep;
While from the sod the melted snows be shed,
And spring's green grass, with summer's ripening sun,
Grows brown and matted like a lion's mane,
How will it be with us? No more to care
Along the journeying wind's wild path to run
When Nature's voice shall call, no more to share
Love's madness—no regret—no longings vain—
When in the night we wake not with the rain.

—Robert Burns Wilson in the Century Magazine.

Scientific vs. Supernatural Ethics.

From the New York World.

Professor Huxley's death makes of especial interest this letter, which the great Englishman wrote to James Creelman, correspondent of the World, just before the well-known writer started for the Japanese war last summer:

"HODESLEA, STAVELY ROAD, EASTBOURNE, JULY 11, 1894.

"MY DEAR MR. CREELMAN: 'Ethics' I take to be the science of conduct, a statement of the rules the observance of which tends to the attainment of the objects which are termed ethical. I conceive ethics to be as much a science as navigation, and not unlike it in so far as it tells us how to steer through life.

"Theology" professes to be a science which furnishes men with truths which have to be taken into account for the guidance of conduct, in addition to those which are attainable by observation and experiment in the realm of nature.

"I, for my part, repudiate the claims of theology to interfere, because I consider it to be a science based on unproved and often highly improbable assumptions. Most people mix up religion with theology, and conceive that the essence of religion is the worship of some theological hypothesis or other. They may be right or wrong, but what I mean by 'religion' is the devotion to an ideal based on intense sympathy with the course of conduct exemplified by that ideal.

"That to the attainment of which a man gives all his energies is the real object of his worship (whatever he may prefer to venerate), from him 'whose god is his belly' up to the purest lover of truth or of his kind.

"On this view no one is without a 'religion' of some sort, and there is no need of any special religious faculty.

"Thus every man's ethical ideal is a matter of feeling. His 'ethics,' as a science, simply tell him the best way of attaining his ideal, just as the ship captain settles in his mind the port which he wishes to reach and applies the rules of the science of navigation to get there.

"I am yours, very sincerely, T. H. HUXLEY."

This is in strong contrast to the criticism which the Duke of Argyle addressed to Mr. Creelman upon the same subject, which he was then studying:

"INVERARY, June 16, 1894.

"MY DEAR SIR: The question you are discussing involves the whole of an immense subject. No man can answer it in a terse sentence.

"In several of my writings I have indicated my belief in an 'independent morality' as distinguished from the utilitarian theory of morals.

"A man may be profoundly moral aside from the influence of any religion. The man may have got the whole stock of his feelings and opinions from the inheritance of a religion which he has personally forgotten or broken loose from. This is common.

"My view, shortly stated, is that morality essentially consists in obedience to rules and laws which rest on the divine authority and have a divine origin, even although individuals may not recognize that origin or authority.

"I have no belief in a morality which is founded only on the utilitarian principle of reasoning on the subject.

"The active and aggressive Atheists of the present day are generally Anarchists in everything, and many, if not most of those who are animated by that spirit and have acted up to it of late in Europe and America, are generally men whose record of private character is of the worst.

"Yours, obediently, ARGYLE."

To ask the question which more immediately concerns our argument—whether science is substantially true—is much like asking whether the sun gives light. And it is because they are conscious how undeniably valid are most of its propositions that the theological party regard science with so much secret alarm. They know that during the two thousand years of its growth some of its large divisions—mathematics, physics, astronomy—have been subject to the rigorous criticisms of successive generations, and have notwithstanding become ever more firmly established. They know that, unlike many of their own doctrines, which were once universally received but have age by age been more frequently called in question, the doctrines, at first confined to a few scattered inquirers, have been slowly growing into general acceptance, and now in great part admitted as beyond dispute. They know that men of science throughout the world subject each other's results to the most searching examination; and that error is mercilessly exposed and rejected as soon as discovered, and, finally, they know still more conclusively that testimony is to be found in the daily verification of scientific predictions and in the never-ceasing triumph of those arts which science guides.—Herbert Spencer.

Last Chance to Obtain a Rare Book.

David Friedrich Strauss's "Life of Jesus Critically Examined" was first published in two volumes for $9. The edition ran out, and another was issued in one volume for $4.50. This edition is almost exhausted, less than fifty copies being in existence. Of what are left we have obtained a share, and can furnish them postpaid at the last price, $4.50. They will not last long, and we advise those of our friends who want a copy to send at once. When these are gone there will be no more to be had. This edition is translated from the fourth German edition by George Eliot, and contains 784 large octavo pages of solid reading, very clearly printed. It is unnecessary to say to students that this is a very valuable work, one which the church wishes had never been written, but which it cannot controvert.

W. J. N. WELLBORN.

NEWTON, KAN., June 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $3, for one year's subscription to the great journal of Freethought and reform, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the "Pictorial Text Book." I have received several copies of the paper, and can say I am more than pleased with your efforts to advance the cause of Freethought and Secularism.

We have quite a number of liberal-minded men in our little city, but public sentiment is so largely in favor of Christian fanaticism that those who are advocates of mental liberty are not in a position to make much of an advance. Therefore I am calling to our aid your valuable paper, and will try to circulate it among as many persons as possible.

Respectfully, J. P. PAGE.

What Would a Mock Legal Trial Be but "Talk?"

WEST SALEM, ILL., June 19, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In my inquiry of a few weeks ago I spoke of having a trial, in order to determine the truth concerning Christ's crucifixion and resurrection, and you asked how I proposed to get the case into court. I meant to create a court for that special purpose, and not to enter the case in any of the civil courts of our country. It would not be necessary to do so. The "depositions" of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John could be represented by Christians, and a fair show given to both sides. The "unbelievers" could have a lawyer to represent them, and the "believers" a lawyer for the same purpose. Such a trial is not at all impossible, and those who are sincere in their belief will, without doubt, welcome it. Of course, all ancient history would be ransacked for evidence to establish the genuineness of the "depositions," and for myself I would be glad to read a report of the trial. Why not make a challenge to that effect in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and see if it is not accepted? Talk is too cheap; give me something substantial.

Yours truly, ED. FULLER.

He Is Not a Freethinker Sub Rosa.

SUB ROSA, ARK., June 8, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.50, which about pays up my subscription to date. Thanks for not discontinuing my paper. I have a splendid excuse for not remitting before: I just did not have the money. Freethinkers are not dead beats. Here is the very hotbed of orthodoxy and superstition; am trying to do a little missionary work by handing around THE TRUTH SEEKER after reading it myself.

Yours truly, JOS. WHITE.

E. R. Mohler is Not E. K. Wohler.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., June 18, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I received the bundle of paper all O. K., and I am a thousand times obliged to you for printing my letter. But I would have been two thousand times obliged if you had signed my name to it. I would like Messrs. Wise and Fleckten to know that E. R. Mohler contributed to their funds instead of E. K. Wohler.

We had Mr. John E. Remsburg here to lecture on June the 9th at the First Unitarian church. He spoke on Thomas Paine very satisfactorily.

Yours respectfully, E. R. MOHLER.

The Political Papers Should Awaken Them.

HOUSTON, TEX., June 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Am in arrears. Sorry for it. Do better next time. Find $2. Times hard. Correspondingly hard up. Everything now goes for Populistic and radical political literature. The encroachments of our judiciary are most to be feared. Of course the priest is behind the judge and I must continue THE TRUTH SEEKER to get "onto" it all. Of course you can't discuss politics. Some of your "Liberals" won't let you. Fine Liberals! The people need a political awakening, and exactly how they are to get it without discussing politics, is something no fellow can find out. Pity there isn't more liberalism among Liberals.

Yours for the cause, H. W. NELSON.

More Missionaries Wanted.

WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS, MONT., }
June 17, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2, for which please send me eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" and one dozen of "Self-Contradictions of the Bible" that you have advertised in your paper, as I think there can be some good done with them in this section of the country.

There are not a great many Freethinkers in this locality, but what there are are very pronounced in their views, and with a little literature we can keep the subject open for discussion, and the more it is discussed and studied the more converts we will have.

Yours truly, DAVID PENWELL.

U. S. S. ALERT,
PANAMA, COLOMBIA, May 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Your letter of the 12th of last month is just at hand through the good offices of my former shipmates. I have been on the Pacific Coast ever since August last. I dropped you a card a week before my subscription was up, telling you to temporarily stop my paper, but it appears you did not get it. Inclosed you will find $5, which please apply to my subscription, and also send me the "Martyrdom of Man," as premium, if entitled to any. I have the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text Book" already.

ED. JOHNSON.

U. S. S. ALERT, PANAMA, May 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10 for books as per list: "Rights of Man," "Blasphemy," "Is This Your Son, My Lord?" the ANNUAL, "Plain Home Talk," "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated," "Maria Monk," and "Deity Analyzed."

As you have $1 to my credit, that will make it right. There are quite a number of Freethinkers on board the Alert. There are three subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and when the mail boat arrives it is the first paper we read. The last books I received have been passed around to any one that would read them, so that to-day I raised $10 for more brain food.

Yours fraternally, WALTER CHINN.

Jeremiah Hacker's Burthen of Years.

VINELAND, N. J., June 3, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have received sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER and thank you for them. I send them where I hope they will do good, although some I send them to are pious, and beg me to send no more such reading matter, and even hint at burning the "dangerous stuff." As they must read it to ascertain if it is worthy to be cremated, they may chance to get their eyes open. A glance at Brother Heston's cartoons should set the dullest mind to thinking. Since I am with Brother Hacker I have the reading of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and other leading Freethought papers kindly sent free of cost to the "good old reformer," as he is called by many. We can but grieve to see the brave old hero failing day by day—his trembling limbs almost refuse to bear him, yet, with the help of a cane, he can take a little exercise every day, but seems to crave little else than sleep and rest. On account of failing eyesight he has been compelled to give up reading, which, to a deaf man as he is, is a double loss, leaving him more alone than ever. But he loves all the Liberal papers; asks me to look them over and mark articles I think he would be most interested in and, with a magnifying glass in hand, he will try to read a little, but it is hard work, and sometimes the brain, too, gives out.

Sincerely and fraternally your friend,
H. G. HEACOCK.

"To the Skies on Flowery Beds of Ease?"

MR. EDITOR: Christians tell Infidels of the mighty advance of Christ's kingdom, yet how they wail and gnash their teeth! The Christian Advocate of New York says the literature of India is non-Christian and anti-Christian. "Of more than 600 newspapers less than twelve are Christian."

During a year the India Bible Society sold 548 Bibles. At the same time a publishing house in Lucknow sold 48,000 copies of the Koran. The Buddhists are forming a stupendous combine for the propagation of Buddhism. Apart from these ancient pagan religious movements, India is flooded with tracts advocating all shades of Infidelity, from Thomas Paine to Ingersoll.

All that holds the Christian church together is its splendid organization, its privileges and wealth, and its respectability and domination of society. Christianity is terribly alarmed. A Christian magazine called The Truth has the following significant editorial notes in its issue of June, 1895. It begins with "A Sign of the Times," and mourns over the popularity of "Trilby;" then "Cleanse the Temple," which refers to some scandal among ministers; then "The Roman Catholic Church a Failure Also;" then "The Old Pulpit and the New;" in which it professes to give "a hard slap at the Higher Critics;" then "Ingersoll Handled;" then "Professor Drummond Reviewed," in which it appears that he has become a dangerous heretic; then "French Protestant Church a Failure;" then "Good and Evil Mixed," in which it says that during the past century 3,000,000 heathen have been converted and 250,000,000 pagans born. Under the head "Worse than an Infidel," we are told that Archbishop Farrar, of the English church, has published a book on Daniel in which he shows it to be a forgery, dating 164 B.C. Under "Cause for Alarm," Sir M. Monier Williams is quoted on "the rapid increase of Infidelity," and under "New Woman's New Bible" more complaint is made because Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, a pronounced unbeliever, associates with Miss Frances Willard, and two or three Universalist women preachers, and Mrs. Robert Ingersoll, who will probably consult her husband about the best way of improving the Bible.

Poor Christianity! It appeals to its constituents for the paragon of sympathy.

Enthusiasm in a Good Cause.

PAGASA SPRINGS, COL., June 28, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 to keep the best paper on earth moving. I cannot do without the precious treasure it brings to me every week; I cannot do without our Putnam, our Macdonald, our Peck, our Wixon, and scores of others, and I must not fail to mention our incomparable Heston, whose artistic genius is like an everflowing fountain. I am a life subscriber, and why should I not be? It was THE TRUTH SEEKER that led me out of the mazy darkness of superstition and preachercraft, and placed my mental feet on the two solid rocks of Freethought and Science. It was THE TRUTH SEEKER that taught me how to think, how to investigate, and how to reject everything not illumined by the light of reason. I was reared amidst almost countless numbers of Methodists and Disciples, and I must say that they are the worst dupes and slaves to their senseless creeds of all the sects that bow the ignorant knee to the shrine of church dogma. After my experience with these two representative churches I have no hesitation in saying that they do their part in filling our jails, penitentiaries and asylums. Now to the young and rising generations and all those that want to be good, kind, and honest: Beware of the quarreling, fighting, fanatical churches. It is horrid to contemplate the cruelties and agonies of the Christian world. I am so glad that the immortal Bruno, Voltaire, and Paine forked out the devils and demons from the subterranean world. Our work of to-day consists in making the Christians and the world at large better. We must show them that we can be better than they can; that we are not governed by whims and imbecilities, and that we are perfectly en rapport with nature and her laws.

Pagasa Springs is the largest hot springs in the world. The country all around is mountainous, covered with a dark forest of evergreens, with here and there a pretty park. Crystal-clear waters run adown the pebbled brooks; thousands of wild flowers mix their sweets with the aroma of the pines.

RUBIE STURGILL.

"Boro."

PALMER, MASS., June 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In answer to Mr. Bostwick's assertion that the Hebrew word "boro" should not be translated he created, because it does not mean to produce something out of nothing, I must say that the English word "created" does not always convey such a meaning either, and therefore the translation is a correct one. The word "boro" is found a great many times in the books of Isaiah, the psalms, and elsewhere, but always in the sense of create, excepting that in Joshua, in the passage which Mr. Bostwick quoted, the word means, perhaps to destroy; and it is one of the few words that are found in the Bible which, in order to make any sense of the passage, must be given a meaning just the reverse from the correct one. For what reason it was put there nobody can explain. Most Hebrew scholars know of the word "baruch" (blessed). It is used in the Bible in that sense in a great number of places, yet there is one place, and only one, where it must be translated just the reverse, i. e., "curse." Job's wife said, "Curse God and die," and she used the word "baruch." Now, would it be right to translate it always "curse" on account of this one instance? Would it be reasonable to suppose that Jacob and Esau, when asking their father for his blessing, and using the word "baruch," meant "Curse us?" Would it be reasonable to suppose that Isaiah, in his many exclamations, such as "Lift up your eyes on high and behold who hath created those things," using the word "boro," means destroy? It is an unsafe plan for Hebrew students to distort an established translation for the sake of fitting it to their argument. We may as well say that the sun is not what it is, in the sense which we all understand, but it is something else, and its primary meaning is a daily paper. I do not consider the controversy about Mr. or Messrs. Elohim of very great importance. Every one of the Bible's heroes was a murderer, robber, or rascal, and this Elohim was ahead of them all. This book is too bad to be indorsed by any intelligent being, and this God too ridiculous to criticise, and I must confess that I have indulged a little bit in discussing about him, more, perhaps, for the sake of arguing than the sincerity of it. Who can read the Bible, and note the atrocious deeds acknowledged to have been committed—all in the name of their God—and not be disgusted? Who can respect a God who made a contract with Abraham, and gave him and his descendants permission to rob and kill right and left, calling it a covenant? Shakspeare's Shylock traded away a few ducats for one pound of flesh, and the Bible's Shylock bartered away the lives of thousands for a small part of the prepuce (Gen. xvii); and this is the Hebrew's Elohim, who for nearly four thousand years was fed on such delicacies, and who, when tired of that kind of diet, demanded his son, another dainty morsel. Here he became the Christian's God, and here the Bible was right in saying that there was darkness over all the earth. And what a darkness! How many crimes, how many persecutions and assassinations, were committed, all in the name of that Christian God!

But we may fairly hope that the darkness is gradually disappearing, and that the human race is at the point of adolescence in regard to truth. The light of science is breaking slowly but surely, the most hopeful child that nature has given birth to for adoption by the human race.

MOREH NEBUCHIM.

Some Suggestions.

LIBERTY, PA., June 30, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find fifty cents for "Hand-Book of Freethought." I am a red-hot Freethinker, but I am really too poor financially to pay $3 a year for a Freethought journal, and so it is with millions, I may say, in these hard times in particular. I have a "boss" idea, such is my idea of it (whatever others may think), which is, if you, or some one else, would publish a Freethought journal in pamphlet form at fifty cents a year, your circulation could be increased, I dare say, 1,000 per cent, notwithstanding you may have a pretty large circulation now. It should be published monthly, and each magazine or number contain from 24 to 30 pages, and as large as you could afford it, say 5x7 inches, making say 300 or 360 pages for a year. Or if you could give them 200 pages in a year, and somewhat condensed, would give them all the Freethought in good shape, just enough to make it interesting. At $3 a year they—the masses—would have a great deal more of Freethought matter than they would have time to read, or care to read, with so much other reading matter—from three to seven newspapers, besides books. The fact is, that many who are leaning toward Freethought (there are millions of them in the church) would be overburdened to read your $3 journal. It should be published in such a manner as to open their eyes by degrees, and coax them into it through strategy, in such a manner that they could not well take offense at what they are reading. There are only a limited number of Freethinkers here, probably fifty in a society of about 3,000 inhabitants. A part of the rising generation are taking to Freethought spontaneously, I may say, with a little effort on my part, time being too limited to do much of it. I am publishing an amateur sheet, The Modern Reflector, which the young read with pleasure. I persuaded some of the church people to take it. A certain number read it with little or no comments. Others are giving me genuine orthodox hell, and have threatened to mob me, rotten-egg me, tar and feather, and ride me on a rail, etc., to frighten me out of it. The fact is, I am too radical by nature to make converts as I started in on it. I found that the stronger I made my points, the more they would curl up against me, squirm, and grate their teeth at me. As I am a novice at it, I find the elephant of bigoted fanaticism is too enormous for me to handle. They have bent their backs up so high they can't get them down, nor can I do it. I never saw such a lot of cattle—brute force, without reason—but they read only one side of the great subject, and depend wholly on their preachers who they think are the smartest men in the world, and that science is all a delusion. I think a good way to make converts to Freethought in the churches would be to publish literature in the form of a dialog between three preachers—one being a rusty old orthodox, the other one a Liberal of the Briggs-Abbot-Müller evolutionary ideas, and the third a moderate Freethinker in argument. I know you could get it up in good shape at ten, fifteen, or twenty-five cents apiece, which would be read with much interest by the church people, and thus Freethought would be interwoven with the other, if they are not totally blind. The force of logic of Freethought in contrast with the other more orthodox preachers would, and could not help but force its way through the thickest shell, and would make converts of the thickest shells, if they have any thinking brains inside of them.

The Freethinker, being also a preacher who does not deny, but accepts a God, finally appeals to science and gets into the "doubting castle" in regard to a personal God, and at last the church people get there too, and the whole racket or argument being apparently in the church, the horrors of, and prejudices against, the Freethinkers are lost to sight.

Respectfully, J. D. BECK.

Spiritualism.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., May 30, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Considerable fault has been found with THE TRUTH SEEKER because it has permitted correspondents to doubt and deny the claims of Spiritualism, and the assertion once met my eye in a Freethought publication that THE TRUTH SEEKER was still fighting Spiritualism.

Permitting an open discussion, or the free expression of individual opinion is the full extent to which Spiritualism has there been fought, and if any Spiritualist claiming to be a Freethinker cannot tolerate such things, he should renounce all claim to the name, for he has no right to it. These thoughts are generated by the last communication of A. D. Swan, who jumps on the stupid Materialist with his accustomed expressions of contempt and disapproval. Materialists, so far as I know, are perfectly willing Spiritualists or any one else should discuss and dissect them and their belief, but if they demand the same right in your columns, the privilege is denounced because they are "fighting Spiritualism." How intolerant and inconsistent so to do! It is true that Moses Hull has written a pamphlet which bears the title, "The Question Settled," but he should have modified it by adding "in the minds of some." I know of no question that is settled in speculative philosophy, and if Spiritualism doesn't come under that head, will some one please state why? If that question was settled, there would be no Materialists; but it isn't settled, and it is just as much an open question to-day as it ever was. Says Prof. John Fiske: "So far as I can judge, I should say that among highly-educated people the belief in a continuation of consciousness after death has visibly weakened during the present century. The belief has never been one that could be maintained on scientific grounds." Mr. Swan's opinion of Professor Fiske is clearly expressed in his last epistle, but some of us hold him high in esteem because of his great ability and honest expression of his well-defined opinions. The rejection of a belief in Spiritualism should not, as I view it, place such people in the list of "bigots," and yet Brother Swan there places them, and would "leave them alone to enjoy the blessings of ignorance," although he can not refrain from time to time jumping on such people because of their unbelief. Let him jump, I say, for Materialists do not fear criticism or the influence of discussion on the "ism" to which they tie. I wish that all Spiritualists felt likewise, but alas! some plead for silence, in which faith they may swim without disturbance, like their brother Christians. Brother Swan has had a test—and I never knew a Spiritualist who wasn't looking for fresh tests, and something more startling and conclusive to brace him up—and he wants it explained on some other grounds than spirit manifestations. Wait a little longer, Brother Swan, and science may yet reveal the seeming mystery, without putting an invisible spirit back of it, for a gas never before known has recently been discovered in the air, and the brilliant aurora borealis, which has puzzled the scientists so long, is now accounted for by the action of electricity on this heretofore unsuspected element in our atmosphere.

The possibilities of this gas are thought to be infinite, and science, we know, is yet in its infancy, thanks to the church, which once had all questions "settled," and saw no need of disturbing the mental condition it had established. The message itself is the same old gag on that much-used expression, "love for mankind," etc., and would not have taxed the brain of an ordinary medium to produce it, for the words are kept in stock, and are daily used wherever mediums profess to receive and transmit communications from spirits.

Had this medium revealed the presence and existence of argon in the atmosphere, told how to extract and manipulate it, the message would have been something more than twaddle. But spirit-messages have never yet startled the world with any surprising revelations. "We are often with you, and send love," is the customary style of spirit-message, but if anything specific and definite is expected it never appears. Nothing not known somewhere and at some time in this world is ever revealed from the other, and Spiritualism now revolves around a mass of well-worn platitudes, with absolutely nothing new or fresh in the shape of ideas.

It is an exhausted subject, and if you hear a lecture on Spiritualism straight, you hear nothing not presented forty years ago. Its system of morality is no better than that of Materialism, and it is doing no more to lift the world higher, if as much; for science, which improves the conditions under which humanity exists, is thoroughly devoted to tangible matter and revealed forces which are ever and always inherent in matter. Science knows nothing of invisible worlds peopled with spooks, and sees no occasion for wasting time in a vain search for such, when so little is known regarding this material one and its possibilities.

While Spiritualism is an improvement on Christianity, because it has no hell except an unhappy mind, it has one thing in common with Christianity, and that is conflicting statements and assertions. No two "spirits" agree in reports brought from "over there," and no description of a spirit world was ever given that would exhaust the imagination of a very ordinary intellect. We are told of nothing that is not an invisible reflection of something seen in this world, and originality has no place in the descriptive powers of "spirits." We are indebted to Spiritualism for nothing but assistance to hope, in deluding those who think another life is desirable. It has given the world no secrets from the bosom of nature, and outside those manifestations that yet seem mysterious, but later on will be fully explained without the aid of another world, Spiritualism is nothing but a system of faith like every other belief based on the hope of immor-talities. We face the grave to-day with no absolute knowledge that consciousness extends beyond it for any human being. Tables may tip and slates receive writing, but these facts depend on the presence of living human beings, and never is there any power or intelligence seen or manifested where flesh and blood is either dead or absent.

C. SEVERANCE.

Mortuary—A. B. Pikard.

MR. EDITOR: The horrors of Infidel death-beds are the common stock-in-trade at church revivals. Christian bravery, however, like Christian fortitude, is but the common article in a new dress. It has become but the idlest theological gossip to say that the Infidel is afraid to die. Again has this truth been exemplified, in the case of our old friend and co-worker, A. B. Pikard, the author of "The Deathbed Repentance of an Infidel," found in this and the next number of THE TRUTH SEEKER. All our Liberal lecturers who have visited this city will recollect Grandpa Pikard. He was an admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER and an occasional contributor to its columns.

Of pioneer stock in New York, born in Onondaga county, in its early settlement, with no educational advantages, he was pre-eminently a self-made man. After arriving at manhood, working on the farm, studying evenings by the light of the world-renowned New England fireplace, he acquired the rudiments of grammar and arithmetic. Thus equipped, he engaged in teaching. Studying in advance of his classes, he soon acquired a fair education. Continuing in this vocation for some years, and taking a course of theology in connection, we next find him in the ministry. In this he remained for a number of years, winning the confidence and esteem of all who knew him. He was a minister of much ability. He tells us of his escape from the church.

He drifted westward, halting in Illinois for a time, thence to Colorado in 1873, settling at Pueblo. The death of his wife occurring in that year, he removed to Canon City. The remainder of his life was spent with his daughter here and his son at Denver, until his death, which occurred at the latter city on the 27th of April, 1894, in his ninety-fifth year.

It was about in his ninetieth year that he requested the undersigned to write through his dictation the "Repentance" above referred to, and to forward a copy of the same to THE TRUTH SEEKER for publication after his death. There was, however, an interruption, preventing its completion at that time. He later wrote, in his own phonetic hand, the concluding paragraph, "Is there a God?" signed and delivered the entire paper into the writer's care.

At the time of the dictation of the "Repentance," and for a number of years previous, and so far as the writer has been informed, to the time of his death, he was a Materialist of the most pronounced type. It was the good fortune of the writer to be well and intimately acquainted with the old hero. His home was a mile distant from ours. He visited us quite frequently, as well as occasionally celebrating his birthday in our family, the last one being the occasion of his ninety-first.

He spent a large part of his times spreading the gospel of reason and common sense. Aggressive in his work, he was the hero of a thousand battles with ministers, elders and priests. Nor did he seek any vantage ground in the conflict with the foe of mental liberty, the superstition of the church. With his favorite weapons, science, reason, and common sense, the ram's horn was a bubble on the seashore. He was ever vigilant and untiring in the performance of what he considered his duty. He was a man of the most refined feeling, a friend of the weak and oppressed and a lover of liberty. Thoroughly in love with his race, had he been possessed of millions he would have spent it all in ameliorating their condition and in achieving their emancipation from the slavery of priestcraft. Logical and consistent in reasoning, of an analytic and inquiring mind, a retentive memory, and good reasoning powers, he was ever reaching out into the world of thought for new truths.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Little Maid Who Raked the Hay.

INSCRIBED TO CALLA DITTMER, AGED EIGHT.

Once, when the summer grass was green
And men had cut the hay,
I saw a maid—a gypsy queen—
Who sang sweet roundelay
With larks that trilled across the way,
That lovely June when grass was green,
And my small maiden raked the hay
Amid the summer sheen.

Her happy eyes were softly blue,
Her hair was bright with gold;
She made a pretty picture, too,
Her little rake to hold.
And smiling sweet, but never bold,
This living picture, warm and true,
Turned swaths of grass, green fold on fold,
Neath skies of summer blue.

Her dimpled cheeks were flushed with red
As roses in the bowers;
The mocking-bird sang overhead
Amongst catalpa flowers,
And near the fountain's silvery showers
A yellow bird came down and said
That she was "fairest of the flowers,"
And waved his little head.

And sang, "Oh! little maiden, come with me
And leave the russet hay;
Come to my home beyond the sea
Where flowers and song has every day."
She turned her rosy face away
And said, "Go to that isle so fair to see;
Fly swift, sweet birdie, do not stay,
Or I shall be too late for tea."

MARY BAIRD FINCH.

Sold by Auction.

There is a pathos about an auction sale of household goods that touches the human heart differently from anything else. Every article is invested with a history, and some pieces there are that speak volumes. There are the chairs with the "tidies" upon them, knitted by fingers long since changed to dust, the dining table around which once gathered a large and happy family. Now all are gone. Not one left to tell of bygone days and merry gatherings about the festive board. The dishes, the precious old china, nicked a little here and there; old-fashioned plates and cups and saucers, brought out only on rare occasions, and prized more than gold. Books are there, bearing pencil-marks where passages seemed to possess peculiar interest. The eyes that read them long ago closed to all earthly scenes, and serenely sleep in the quiet of perpetual slumber. Little keepsakes scattered here and there, of no value now, but once so highly prized by the dead and gone owner of the same; pictures, quaint and olden; decorations, once beautiful and attractive, now dusty and grimy, with the marks of age and decay upon them; curtains and draperies, whose faded folds would seem almost to shut out from eager eyes of purchasers the panorama of the past. I remember once, at an auction sale of household goods, the property of a maiden lady, who had died almost alone except for the presence of an aged washerwoman, the auctioneer held up a tiny pair of white kid gloves, very old in style and make. They had evidently been worn but once, at some wedding, perhaps, or party, when hope was young and the owner herself had lovers gay and handsome. The gloves showed that the hands that had worn them were small and shapely.

"How much am I offered for the gloves?" asked the auctioneer.

A dealer in second-hand goods called hoarsely, "Three cents!" and they went to him. Then there were the little kid slippers, just where she left them when removed for the last time.

The feet they had encased were in the ground, and the grass was growing above them. Nobody seemed to care for the slippers except the second-hand dealer, and he got them at his own price.

There was a case of knick-knacks, gifts from one and another at various times, fancy boxes, jewels, a little watch and chain, individual cups, rare plates, bottles of perfumery, jewel cases, pin-cushions, bits of velvet and satin made into curious shapes. One by one, they were held up to the greedy eyes of purchasers, and sold, these things, hallowed to the owner each with its own certain interest. It seemed almost shocking that the things should be handled and scanned by the crowd. The jokes passed and loud laughter at the sallies of would-be wit of the auctioneer seemed somehow out of harmony with the time and scene.

One other day I chanced to be present at another auction sale of household goods, for although I seldom find myself among the purchasers, a strange sort of fascination draws me to such sales. This time, the owner of the premises, a woman, had gone hopelessly insane, and having no near relatives, a guardian had been appointed. She had been placed in an asylum, and an auction called to dispose of her property for her support. She had become like a little child, it was said, and would not realize what was being done with her goods and chattels if she should be told. Blessed thought. She did not know, and could not realize.

It was on the 15th of March, 1895, and it was snowing. The house was old-fashioned, and was built when the town was in its infancy, and the quarter had been once considered fashionable, but in later years was just the reverse.

The sale attracted many men and women, antiquarians and others, from different sections. The rough and uncouth, the dirty and the clean, the refined and delicate, the ragged and the richly dressed, the curious, the searcher for relics and odd pieces, and the hard-fisted, business men, all mingled freely, exchanging views and opinions on the display of furniture and other articles.

The women of the neighborhood, who had come in with shawls on their heads, gazed curiously upon the faces of those seldom seen in that locality, and who had come to purchase "Aunt Mary's" household goods and gods, for the old lady had jealously guarded and loved her belongings. Antique tables, mahogany stands and desks brought good prices. Pewter porringers and brass candle-sticks were sold cheaply enough, but the blue and white ware, the plates with green leaves and pink roses, the old china teapots and quaint sugar bowls won good prices. There was a box of old jack-knives, worn and dulled with age. "What did she keep those for?" asked one. Ah, but there were precious memories welded in with every rusty, broken blade.

How to Strengthen the Memory. By M. L. Holbrook, M.D. $1.

A Physician's Sermon to Young Men. By Dr. W. Pratt. Price, 25 cents. Prof. R. A. Proctor, the well-known English astronomer, says of it: "Through false delicacy ladies and youths are left to fall into trouble, and not a few have their prospects of a healthy happy life absolutely ruined. The little book before us is intended to be put into the hands of young men by fathers who are unwilling or incapable of discharging a father's duty in this respect, and as not one father in ten is, we believe, ready to do what is right by his boys himself, it is well that such a book as this should be available. If it is read by all who should read it, its sale will be counted by hundreds of thousands." The publisher will send 10 copies by mail, postpaid, for $2. Should anyone desire them by the 100 or 1,000 they can make satisfactory terms by correspondence.

BRAIN AND BIBLE; OR
THE CONFLICT BETWEEN MENTAL SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.
By EDGAR C. BEALL, M.D.,
with a preface by
R. G. INGERSOLL.
This is the only work of its kind in the literature of Freethought. Its arguments are based upon scientific phrenology, and appeal directly to the reader's sense of logic and love of justice. It is eloquent as well as convincing.
Price, cloth, $1. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

$679,694,439.
By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property
in the United States.
Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?
REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.
Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominations. Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.
This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.
By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:
Ten copies..... $1.00
Fifty copies..... 4.50
One hundred copies..... 8.00

400 Years OF Freethought

By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pp., Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. $5.
With The Truth Seeker for One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!
Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES.
A new edition of that splendid prose poem "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt boveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

Not for Parsons.

"Why do you receive so many fools in your order?" was said to a Jesuit. "We need saints."—Voltaire.

BISHOP: "Do you think it is right to partake of this hash on Friday?" Low Church Clergyman: "Entirely orthodox; it is composed of the thirty-nine articles."—Puck.

MRS. FOGG: "Only think of it! They do say that Mr. Figg was seen playing whist last Sunday. Isn't it awful!" "Mr. Fogg: But then, you must remember that Figg plays so poorly."

"What are you going to preach about to-morrow?" asked a Harlem minister's wife of her husband. "I am going to preach about female vanity." "You will have to select some other topic. I'm going to wear my new dress and hat."—Texas Siftings.

WILLY WIGGINS: "Will you please tell me where the text was this mornin'." The Pastor: "Why, certainly, my little man! The second chapter of John, the fourth verse. I am pleased to know that one so young is so anxious to remember my text." Willy Wiggins: "Yes; I played hooky from church this morning, and dad allers asks me der text, to see whedder I was dere or not."—Puck.

In a recent article in the New York Tribune, J. B. Gaylord says that "The Musselmans of India are no better than Christians, and it is rarely, if ever, safe to trust them." Several of the church journals in this country have printed "Didn't-I-tell-you-so?" articles without stopping to take in the full meaning of the writer's words. Mr. Gaylord is a circus man and probably came in contact in the East with just the sort of Musselmans who occupy a social and intellectual position similar to that occupied by American Christians who follow the circus business.—Moslem World.

A COUNTRY judge in Hungary gave a decision a few days ago of which Solomon himself might be proud. Members of the Nazarene sect in the town of Gyoma requested his honor to be allowed to crucify one of their number, "who was a messiah, and had been called to heaven to save men." The judge for a moment was dumb-founded. "Friends," he replied, after recovering his senses, "I do not wish to interfere with your religious practices. If your messiah wishes to be crucified, let him prepare for death. Remember, however, that if he does not rise again in three days, I shall cause every one of you to be hanged." The Nazarenes, it is needless to add, allowed their chief to live.—Exchange.

Eighty years ago Uncle Gideon Goodwin was one of the characters of this town. At that time the Methodists used to gather at the houses to hold their prayer meetings, and as Gideon was a devout worshiper of that creed, he was a regular attendant. One night the meeting was held at the house of Harlow Harden, and Gideon was there. In those days excitement ran high, and just as the enthusiasm of the assemblage was wrought to the highest pitch, "Uncle Harden," as he was always called, arose to his feet, and lifting up his hands, shouted in a voice full of fervor: "Glory to Gideon!" Hardly had the chorus of amens which this utterance called forth died away when Goodwin, who thought that the praise was meant for him, and was bound to return the compliment, jumped up and said: "Glory to you, too, Uncle Harden!" That broke up the meeting.—Gardner (Me.) Reporter-Journal.

THERE is a story in connection with a witness in a London court, an intelligent mechanic, who on being asked his occupation, answered, "I am a worm hole maker." The judge was so surprised with such an answer that he exclaimed—"W-h-a-t!" "A worm-hole maker, please your worship." "What do you mean, sir?" inquired the judge, sharply. "Why," explained the man, "I am employed in Wardour street to make worm holes in furniture wot Americans and country folks come there to buy as antiques." A very good name to bestow on a large part of the clergy of our time. They are of the same trade—"worm-hole makers." They work at it steadily. Their business is to take the institutions of the present age and work with all industry to convert them into "antiques." They want to see worm-holes in them, or else they cannot abide them. The new isn't right until it is all honeycombed with worm-holes. It must be made to look old, at any rate. There must be something of the Middle Ages about it, or even far back of that. To stop short of Calvin would look altogether too new. Real orthodoxy dotes on worms.—Banner of Light.

CHRISTIANITY A REWARD FOR CRIME. Authenticated by the Bible. O B Whitford, M.D.

DID MAN FALL? Is the Garden of Eden a Fact? Israel W Groh.

EPIDEMIC DELUSIONS. A Lecture by Frederic R. Marvin, M.D. Giving reasonable reasons for Religious and other Delusions.

FALSE CLAIMS OF THE CHURCH. John E. Remsburg's most noted work, and one of the most effective ever written by any Freethinker.

FIRST EPISTLE OF BENNETT THE APOSTLE TO THE TRUTH SEEKERS.

Written while journeying in and near the land of Yahweh. Containing the best moral instructions of the world from the great teachers of the former ages. D M Bennett.

THE GIANT DELUSION. A paper read before the Freethought International Congress at Chicago. One of Otto Wettstein's fraternal attacks on Spiritualism.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY. To which is added a poem on Thomas Paine. One of Samuel P. Putnam's most brilliant lectures. Every Christian who asks the idiotic question, "What Has Infidelity Done?" should be induced to read this book, if he has to be paid to do it.

HOW CAN WE BE SAVED? Was Jesus Supernaturally Conceived, and did he Rise from the Dead? Israel W Groh.

INGERSOLL AND JESUS. Showing how the two agree. A poem by Samuel P Putnam.

THE LIMITATIONS OF TOLERATION.

A discussion between Col Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic R. Conder, Ex-Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, before the Nineteenth Century Club of New York. "Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him." Colonel Ingersoll maintains this, the others deny it. Mr. Conder is a Roman Catholic, Mr. Woodford a Protestant.

MATERIALISM; Its History, and Its Influence Upon Society. Dr. Louis Buchner.

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE WORKERS.

A Consideration of the Marvels and Miracles of the New Testament. One of John Peck's best books.

MOSES BEFORE THE COURT, or The Forgery of the Old Testament. Dedicated to the Clergy. H. J. Seigneur, M.D.

THE NEW GOD. "It is an open secret that man has always made his Gods. They exist in and through him, as the image exists in and through the mirror. Take away man and you take away God—the image vanishes." This pamphlet, therefore, is a consideration of what kind of a God man should make. Samuel P. Putnam.

ORTHODOXY. A lecture by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and one of that great man's best. The subjects considered are: Orthodox Religion Dying Out, Religious Deaths and Births, The Religion of Reciprocity, Mohammed, The Destruction of Art, The Discovery of America, Copernicus and Kepler, Charles Darwin, Special Providence, The Latest Creed, God as a Governor, The Love of God, The Fall of Man, The Atonement, The Second Birth, Inspiration, The Reign of Truth and Love, The Wars It Brought, The Resurrection, The Judgment-Day, Pious Evasions, "No Bible, No Civilization," Miracles of the New Testament, The Ascension, Casting out Devils, Necessity of Belief, Eternal Punishment, Some who are Damned, What I Believe, Immortality. This lecture is on the famous text, "The Clergy know that I know that they do not know."

PERSONAL EXISTENCE AFTER DEATH IMPROBABLE. L. R. Smith.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS MASS MEETING AT LINCOLN HALL, WASHINGTON. Being the Speeches of Hon. FREDERICK DOUGLASS and Col. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL on the Decision of the United States Court that the Civil Rights Act is Unconstitutional. Fifty-three large octavo pages, of which Colonel Ingersoll's speech occupies 38 pages.

PULPIT, PEW, AND CRADLE. So long as the Pulpit speaks to believing Pews composed chiefly of mothers, the cradle will be rocked by ghosts and the race will remain on its knees to a devil of its own creation and to a God who is powerless against him. One of Helen Gardner's brightest efforts.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY BETTER THAN ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. M. Babcock.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS. One of L. K. Washburn's best lectures, and it is, like all of his, very good.

THE ROARING LION ON THE TRACK.

One of M. Babcock's comical sermons.

SCIENCE vs. RELIGION, or The Conflict Between Reason and Superstition. T O Widd combe.

ST. MATTHEW BEFORE THE COURT.

Presenting the evidence of the forgery of his alleged gospel. H J Seigneur.

SISTER LUCY AND HER AWFUL DISCLOSURES REGARDING NEW HALL CONVENT. Showing that Convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom.

SPIRITUALISM FROM A MATERIALISTIC STANDPOINT. B F Underwood.

Written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK. Torture Implements Employed in the 15th and 16th centuries for the promulgation of Christianity. Being the Nuremberg Collection, with specimens from the Holy Inquisition. 28 pictures. The descriptions and reflections by George E. Macdonald.

VICTOR HUGO'S ORATION ON VOLTAIRE, delivered on the one hundredth anniversary of Voltaire's death. Translated by James Parton, author of the Life of Voltaire. To which are added the three great poems of Goethe, George Eliot, and Longfellow.

WAS CHRIST CRUCIFIED? Austin Bierbower. A lawyer's consideration of the evidence of that alleged event.

WAS JESUS INSANE? A consideration of Christ's alleged acts which would lead one to that conclusion. L K Washburn.

WHY DON'T HE LEND A HAND? And other Agnostic Poems. Samuel P. Putnam.

The title poem is perhaps the most popular of Mr. Putnam's many poems, and a great many editions of it have been called for. The other poems are: The Golden Age, The Ideal and the Real, Not Dead, but Living, Fruition, Hope, Thomas Paine, Nature's Gospel, Address to Deity, and the short poem so often recited with great effect by Charles Watts, Give Us Light.

WILL THE COMING MAN WORSHIP GOD? B F Underwood; written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

'In the nature of things there can be no evidence to establish the claim of inspiration.' Such is the text of the Colonel's new lecture entitled

All About the Holy Bible

Just published in a large and handsome pamphlet. Price 25 cents. Address The Truth Seeker Co., New York.

The Great Ingersoll Controversy

Containing the famous Christmas Sermon by Colonel Ingersoll, the protests thereby evoked from the ministers who think they own this country and all therein, and Colonel Ingersoll's replies to the same. A finely gotten up pamphlet. Price, 25 cents.

Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

LINCOLN

This is Colonel INGERSOLL's great lecture, printed in a handsome pamphlet, and containing the Century's famous portrait of Lincoln—said to be the best extant. Price, 25 cents.

Gems of Thought.

INTELLIGENCE is man's headlight.—Galveston News.

CULTIVATE the right tendencies in humanity and the wrong ones must die out.—Elizabeth Harrison.

If being orthodox you die at the stake, you are a martyr; if being a heretic—why, then, you are a man burnt.—Rev. James Martineau.

ETHICAL judgments must take account of the fact that the effort, bodily or mental, which is easy to one is laborious to another.—Herbert Spencer.

If a tulip could speak, and said, "My vegetation and I are two distinct beings, evidently joined together," would you not mock at the tulip?—Voltaire.

SUNDAY worship is a thing of the past. It is one thing to keep Sunday as a day for physical, intellectual, and moral improvement, and quite another thing to make the day an object of increasing idolatry.—Spirits, Cincinnati.

THE noble army of non-resistant martyrs would have died in vain were their work unaided by the more serviceable army of strenuous objectors. It requires daily courage and inexhaustible stamina to fight, to object, to "kick" for right and rights.—The New Unity.

THE vaunted freedom from creeds of Unitarianism has been something like the boasted absence of state religion in the United States—an absence which leaves us fettered by the Sabbath, taxed for an army of explicitly unconstitutional chaplains, and taxed to support all churches because church property is not taxed.—Moncure D. Conway.

THERE is but one use for law, but one excuse for government—the preservation of liberty—to give to each man his own, to secure to the farmer what he produces from the soil, the mechanic what he invents and makes, to the artist what he creates, to the thinker the right to express his thoughts. Liberty is the breath of progress.—Ingersoll.

THE time is past for repression. Despotism has done its work; but the day of despotism is gone, and the only remedy is a full and fair investigation. Things will never right themselves if they are let alone. It is idle to say peace when there is no peace; and the concealed imposthume is more dangerous than an open wound. The church authorities still refuse to look their difficulties in the face; they prescribe for mental troubles the established doses of Paley and Pearson; they refuse dangerous questions as sinful, and tread the round of commonplace in placid comfort. But it will not avail.—J. A. Froude.

It is absurd to believe, as we must believe, that the individual upon any ground should abdicate his self-hood and submit his spiritual nature at any time to the decisions of majorities. It is grotesque that the gods should be made to starve in creeds—that any man or woman should be brought to the border-land of effacement and be led to believe that the instinct of autonomy which asserts itself in each personality is an infinitesimal sham to which men must slavishly surrender. It is all grotesque. It is all natural too. We are all grotesque. Everything is absurd without freedom. Everything seems rational and to assume its right place when freedom arrives. Private right can never be respected under slavery. It is always respected under freedom. The individual can prosper only when he is in a propitiating atmosphere.—Horace L. Traubel.

With a fairly extensive knowledge of the writers of my own period, I can honestly say that I have scarcely met one individual who has not deteriorated morally by the pursuit of literary fame. For complete literary success among contemporaries, it is imperative that a man should either have no real opinions, or be able to conceal such as he possesses, that he should have one eye on the market and the other on the public journals, that he should humbug himself into the delusion that book-writing is the highest work in the universe, and that he should regulate his likes and dislikes by one law, that of expediency. If his nature

Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, and acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces. Hall's Catarrh Cure is not a quack medicine. It was prescribed by one of the best physicians in this country for years, and is a regular prescription. is in arms against anything that is rotten in society or in literature itself, he must be silent. Above all, he must lay this solemn truth to heart, that when the world speaks well of him the world will demand the price of praise, and that price will possibly be his living soul. He may tinker, he may trim, he may succeed, he may be buried in Westminster Abbey, he may hear before he dies all the people saying, "How good and great he is! how perfect is his art! how gloriously he embodies the tendencies of his Time!" but he will know all the same that the price has been paid, and that his living soul has gone, to furnish that whitewashed sepulcher, a Blameless Reputation.—Robert Buchanan.

Miscellaneous.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of his volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

A small farm of 10 acres 86 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water, good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes walk of the railroad station, 9 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes walk.

The place is especially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1,000 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest, overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

News of the Week.

OPEN gambling has been stopped in Saratoga Springs, for the present.

TEN people were killed by a flood and washout at Winona, Mo., on July 6th.

THE Pullman Company has advanced the pay of its 4,000 employees 10 per cent.

ON July 4th thirteen spectators of a bicycle race at Buffalo were injured by the collapsing of the grand stand.

THE Populists of Kentucky have nominated T. S. Pettit for governor and C. S. Bate for United States Senator.

RECENTLY a thousand tons of Ohio steel were shipped from Youngstown to England. It is the first event of the kind.

THE average cost of hauling a ton of freight one mile in Europe is two cents. In the United States it is four-fifths of a cent.

THE Supreme Court of Kansas decides that Mrs. Mary A. Lease is not entitled to the place she claims on the state Board of Charities.

THERE was a severe wind storm at Chicago and in the vicinity on July 7th. Many boats were capsized and several lives lost.

By the giving way of the bridge that spans the St. Joseph river at Bristol, Ind., more than seventy persons were injured on July 4th.

JUDGE Ross, of California, has decided the suit of the United States for $15,000,000 against the Leland Stanford estate against the government.

THE three post office robbers, Killoran, Allen, and Russell, wanted in so many places in the United States, escaped from Ludlow Street Jail in this city on July 4th.

J. T. CARTER, the ink and mucilage manufacturer of Boston, was drowned while bathing at Harwich, near Cape Cod, on July 5th. He was about sixty years of age.

IN Minnesota the grasshopper machines sometimes gather as many as 8,000 bushels of grasshoppers in one day. There are more than 400 hundred of these machines at work.

THE Mississippi steamer Lady Lee sunk near Memphis on July 6th. It is supposed that at least twenty persons lost their lives. The boat struck on a reef off Island No. 60.

THE French have lately had very sanguinary battles with the Hovas in Madagascar, defeating them with great slaughter. Of course France has no ethical sanction for her occupation of the Island.

CAPT. HENRY W. HOWGATE, convicted of forgery and falsification of accounts as disbursing officer of the United States Signal Service, has been sentenced to eight years' imprisonment in the Albany penitentiary.

ON July 4th, at Siberia, Ind., a German picnic was attacked by a gang of roughs and in the desperate fight which followed three men were killed, five mortally wounded, and about fifty more severely hurt.

THE Cuban insurgents claim that the Spanish troops are practically shut up in the cities, the Cubans holding three-fourths of the Island. Even one of the suburbs of Havana has been put under martial law by the Spanish commander.

It is understood that the Pope has relieved the wage earners of the church, in the United States, from the obligation to fast on any days except Fridays, Ash Wednesday, the Wednesday and Saturday of Holy Week, and the vigil of Christmas.

THERE was a religious riot in East Boston on July 4th, the Catholics attacking a procession of Orangemen, A. P. A.'s, and members of other similar organizations. The Protestants were prepared for the anticipated conflict, and the result was one innocent spectator killed, a Catholic mortally wounded, and a large number of participants and spectators more or less injured. This trouble will make the situation in Massachusetts more delicate than ever, for the religious passions of both factions are fearfully aroused.

MICHAEL CLEARY, of Clonmel, Ireland, who, assisted by the woman's father and several of his neighbors, burned his wife, Bridget Cleary, to death, because he thought her a witch, or fairy, has been sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment. His accomplices were sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from six months to five years. The church killed millions of people on the charge of witchcraft, but it is not recorded that any of the murderers were punished for their cruel crimes. The conviction of Cleary and his abettors shows that science and Freethought have partially civilized the Christian world.

ILLINOIS follows Massachusetts and Pennsylvania in adopting the indefinite-sentence plan for dealing with its penitentiary convicts. All prisoners, except those convicted for murder and arson, will serve such time between the minimum and maximum term prescribed by law for their offenses as the warden and penitentiary commissioners deem to be justified by their conduct. Those officers may also establish regulations under which a prisoner may be paroled and go out to work for himself and family, to be returned to prison to serve out the full term if he violates the parole. This can be done only when arrangements have been made for honorable and useful employment for a term of not less than six months, without expense to the state.

SECRETARY M. R. LEVERSON, of the Anti-Vaccination Society of America, wants to put the claims for vaccination to a systematic and thorough test, and so he sends to the boards of health all over the country this proposition: "That there be selected 10,000 children, in similar conditions of life, of the ages of (say) three months to one year, at present unvaccinated, the parents or other lawful guardians of 5,000 of whom shall be willing, and of the other 5,000 unwilling, that they should be vaccinated; that the first 5,000 shall then be vaccinated by health officers, the other 5,000 to continue unvaccinated; that the whole 10,000 be kept, so far as the parents will permit, under the observation of boards and of physicians to be selected by the society; that the vital statistics of the 10,000 children be then published yearly."

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.
 By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS)

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

What a New Subscriber, Who Has Received His Pictorial Text-Book, Says of It.

LAMAR, Mo., May 8, 1895.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is received, and after a careful examination of the work I unhesitatingly pronounce it one of the most impressive Freethought works ever issued from the press. It will indeed "corner the parson" and all his flock, and I shall take great pleasure in showing the book to my orthodox friends. As a reference book it is invaluable, and it should find a place in every Freethinker's library.

Respectfully, W. F. BAILY.

LIST OF PREMIUMS WITH THE TRUTH SEEKER

When Renewing Your Subscription, Take Advantage of These Good Offers.

For $6.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and S. P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" ($5). Large Octavo, 1150 pages, gilt sides and back, marbled edges—the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press. 140 Half Tone Engravings of the Prominent Freethinkers of the past four centuries.

The object of this work is to present the Course of Freethought throughout the Civilized World from the time of Columbus and Bruno to the time of Ingersoll. It is a radical Historic Record of the greatest developments of the human race. It reveals Freethought as an intellectual, moral, literary, social, industrial, and political movement. It shows what Freethought is in itself, how manifold are its influences, and with what promise we can hail its future triumph. "FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT" embraces the most illustrious pages of human history, adorned with the brightest genius, radiant with the most splendid poetry, rich with the greatest inventions and discoveries, and ennobled with freedom's most shining advance. Nothing can be more interesting or more inspiring to the pioneer workers of to-day, to those who are still in the van for human rights and progress. No Liberal can afford to be without this book. It contains the greatest thoughts and the greatest deeds of the greatest men in one harmonious and magnificent whole, a vivid picture of man's sublimest evolution, with the added glory of woman's emancipation from the chains and slavery of a barbaric church.

Darwin and After Darwin

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Orthodox Shortightedness.

The Wesleyan Christian Advocate, of Atlanta, is an amusing sheet. Of course it takes itself very seriously, and probably has not the slightest idea that its deliverances are irresistibly funny. The explanation of this inability to see its own jokes is found in the fact that it looks at everything from the inside of an inherited suit of medieval armor, the eye-holes of the helmet being filled in with blue mica, which gives the whole landscape the same funereal shade, in which the wearer of the helmet sees all things as though he saw them not.

Governor Atkinson of Georgia has been very sick, and for some time it was thought that his life could not possibly be saved. But, thanks to a rugged constitution, a strong will, and good care, he is now on the way to restored health and vigor. Of the struggle for life the Columbus Herald says:

"Governor Atkinson made the best fight of his life battling against death itself, in the face of the most unfavorable conditions. This fight will be memorable in the annals of Georgia. Old men will tell their children and grandchildren how Georgia's governor pulled himself from the jaws of death, after his eyes had become glazed and the dew of death itself had rested on his brow; after seven of the best physicians had lost all hope and pronounced him beyond all human aid. They will tell how, after all this, Governor Atkinson's matchless will power and determination to live triumphed against all odds."

To the "mere worldling" that sounds all right, but it is precisely that apparently innocent paragraph which has aroused the combined grief and indignation of the Christian Advocate and led to its solemn jesting. It says that it "is a fair sample of the comments of the secular press on the sickness and recovery of Governor Atkinson." It continues:

"And these comments are particularly noticeable in that the God and the father of Georgia's governor, and of us all, has been entirely, if not studiously eliminated. It will not be a very desirable lesson for fathers to teach their children, that Georgia's governor 'pulled himself from the jaws of death,' for as a matter of fact this is a false lesson and there can never come a time in the history of this commonwealth when it will be wholesome to let young men believe, or be taught, that God is eliminated from human affairs, that providence is banished and man can 'pull himself out of the jaws' of any emergency."

It seems incredible that any editor in this age should be so preternaturally dull as not to see the wide-open trap into which he drops himself by such recklessness. If a God must be predicated to account for the recovery of Governor Atkinson, who is responsible for his sickness? If natural conditions and agencies may not be credited with his return to health, why should they be debited with his prostration? If a governor, or a plain citizen, cannot get well without the assistance of a god, the conclusion is inevitable that he owes his sickness to said god. Men when sick wish to recover, and so their will power and desires work together to pull them out of the jaws of the emergency. On the other hand, they do not wish to get sick, and their desires and will work together to sustain the body in its struggle with the approaching disease. From all of which it appears that it costs God a greater effort to make men sick than it does to help them get well. Then why thank him for the recovery when you do not blame him for the sickness? Are man and other parts of nature to get all the censure, and God—who, according to the theory of all Theists, made everything and had infinit foreknowledge and power—get all the praise?

The Advocate is apprehensive that the poor young men of the Empire state of the South will go to the demnition bow-wows if they get the idea into their heads that "man can pull himself out of the jaws of any emergency." We assure the dear editor that a sturdy self-reliance is of more assistance to a man in an emergency than all the gods that have been invented by all the dreamers of all the ages. But the trouble with the Rev. W. F. Glenn is that he thinks the secular papers have slighted the influence of his prayers and the prayers of his fellow Wesleyans, for he informs us that he prayed for the recovery of the governor. Shall it be made known to the people of Georgia that the prayers were of no avail? Perish the thought! If prayer does not move God, or if there is no God to move, would not the preacher's occupation be gone? What was the complaint of the silversmiths of Ephesus? The Georgia papers are told that they should see in the recovery of Governor Atkinson the "power and goodness of God." But where was this power and goodness during those weeks of agony? Why did this god of infinit wisdom make pain and death the inseparable accompaniments of life? Once more the Advocate:

"Gentlemen, God is in human affairs—wisdom it is to acknowledge this—any other course is folly beyond measure. If we ignore God there will come a time when he will laugh at our calamity and mock when our fear cometh. Our God is a consuming fire to the impenitent and rebellious."

Your God is a fiend, Mr. Glenn, the creation of the brain of savages, and is as much out of place in this age of science and humanity as Moloch of the Phenicians. You declare that he will mock the fear of the impenitent and rebellious. Was it not he who mocked the prayers and agony of the shipwrecked and starving Wesleyan missionaries to the West Indies? Why should the Advocate indulge in this grim and unseemly jesting? However, on second thought, we are forced to the melancholy conclusion that there are yet millions of young people who find something suited to their natures in these death's-head jokes, as witness the convention in Boston of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor.

What Is the Issue and the Danger?

It is not impossible that some of our readers, especially those at a distance from New York, may think that we are devoting an undue proportion of our space to the Sunday closing fight in this city. It may also be that others look upon the struggle as merely a phase of the prohibition issue, and hence as one not particularly interesting to Free-thinkers, as Freethinkers. If there are any of either class among THE TRUTH SEEKER's readers we trust that they will carefully review the steps by which they have reached their present position, and we particularly call their attention to what follows in this article, as well as to what we have heretofore written on this subject. Public Opinion is a journal which weekly gathers up and presents in condensed form the news of the world and the opinions expressed by representative journalists of the various schools of politics, religion, sociology, and ethics. Preceding its department of "American Affairs" it gives in brief its "Own Point of View." In its issue of July 11th it says:

"Again New York city and state are offering the rest of the country a great object lesson in government. A contest has been entered upon in this city which, unless all signs fail, will prove one of the greatest, bitterest, and most momentous political struggles ever witnessed in this country, or indeed any other. The elements entering into the struggle are numerous and complex, including economic, social, political, and religious considerations, and affecting in one aspect or another the interests, beliefs, or feelings of every man, woman, and child in the state. Nor is that all. The spirit manifested in this contest in New York, the weapons employed, and the result reached, will undoubtedly have a potent influence upon public sentiment, and will in greater or less degree determine public action, in many if not most cities and states throughout the country. It is in reality, therefore, a national struggle that has been entered upon in New York; and this is equally evident from whichever point of view we look at it, whether as advocates of the 'freer' Sunday, the 'Continental' Sunday, the observance of Sunday as a holiday, or as advocates of the so-called 'American' Sunday, and opponents of the idea that Sunday should be regarded merely as a holiday instead of a day of strict religious observance, and which claims for that day a religious observance not required for any other day."

Public Opinion has here voiced what has been our conviction from the beginning of this struggle. Rather, we have been convinced for some years that the battle on the Sunday question was already in progress, and for two years there has been no doubt in the mind of any close observer of current events, and student of human motives and forces, that the time was here when the enemies of the free Sunday must be met at every point if we were to preserve the heritage of religious liberty received from the fathers of the republic. It is of no use to hedge, it is of no use to dodge, it is of no use to attempt to compromise; it is folly to suppose that by tacitly assenting to the closing of the saloon on Sunday we shall preserve the free Sunday for "legitimate occupations and amusements." No one disputes, of course, that the antagonism to the saloon, as such, is an element in the present contest here in New York, as it is in other cities and states; but it is only an element, one, and not the most important factor in the tremendous conflict upon which we have entered. The Prohibitionist, considered simply as such, has to a slight extent confused the issue, but inasmuch as Prohibitionists, with comparatively few exceptions, are also churchmen, it is difficult to analyze their actions so as to be able to tell with approximate accuracy how much they do as haters of the liquor traffic and how much as defenders of the "sanctity of the Sabbath." But it is enough for us, as Freethinkers, to know that the war is a religious one, that the crusade now under way in all parts of the country is the result of a profound dissatisfaction in the church with our secular form of government, and that it is the fixed purpose of the leaders in this movement to compel the observance of Sunday as a holy day.

This is proved by the Christian amendment to the Federal Constitution proposed by the National Reform Association, and by the official declarations of this body and of the Sabbath associations and other Christian organizations; by the national Sabbath law and District of Columbia bills introduced in Congress; by the new Massachusetts law forbidding all Sunday amusements and attendance thereon, except "sacred concerts;" by the refusal of the Pennsylvania legislature to legalize the publication and sale of Sunday papers; by the fight against Sunday ball-playing, already successful in St. Paul and Toledo; by the new barber shop Sunday closing laws in New York, California, and Illinois; by the savage pursuit of the Seventh-Day Adventists in Tennessee, Georgia, Maryland, Arkansas, Massachusetts, and other states; by the closing in this city of the delicatessen stores after 10 A. M. and the fight made on Sunday amusements; by the decisions affirming the constitutionality of Sunday laws rendered by the supreme courts of Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, and other states; by the repeated and emphatic averments of leading Sabbatharians that the perpetuity of Christianity depends upon the enactment and enforcement of Sabbath laws; by the official statement of purposes of the California Sabbath Union, which says that the Union exists "to promote religious influence by state legislation, by county and municipal ordinances, and to prevent all open acts of Sabbath desecration; by numerous other Sabbath laws passed by state legislatures during the past year for the purpose of preventing Sunday labor and amusements, and by the many other bills drafted by the various Sabbath associations, and which, so far, have not been favorably considered.

Our texts have often been taken from the bible of events here in New York, but the expositions and exhortations are addressed to the whole country, for the spirit of Puritanism now dominant here is alive and malevolently active in every state of the Union. It is, indeed, as Public Opinion says, a national struggle upon which we have entered, and everywhere the battle is between medievalism and modern science and thought, between bigotry and open-mindedness, between Puritanism and Liberalism, between theocracy and secularism, between despotism and liberty.

Now to consider a few press comments on the situation: The New York Post, referring to the claim that the great majority of the people of this city are against the enforcement of the law as it now stands, says that "if a majority are in favor of Sunday selling, under specified conditions, their wishes will have to be obeyed. That is the fundamental principle of majority government." Does the Post forget that majorities have nothing to do with what are popularly known as the reserved rights of the citizen? If the majority in any state should enact that hereafter no Freethinker should be permitted to vote, would the Post affirm that the majority had a constitutional and ethical right to establish such a religious qualification? As a matter of convenience it has been conceded that the majority is to rule in such concerns as properly come within the purview of legislation, but how a man shall observe Sunday, what he may buy or sell on that day, does not come within that purview. But the Post is at least willing that a majority favorable to freedom shall prevail over a minority inimical thereto, which is more than some of the paternalists will grant their right to do. The Chicago Record says that the idea that the enforcement of law depends upon public sentiment "will not stand the test in any state of the American Union." With the Record the principle of majority rule is subordinated to the fetichistic notion that law is to be enforced regardless of its justice or lack of justice. A fanatical minority is to be assisted by the officers of the law in its persecution of the majority if it can succeed, by forged petitions or otherwise, in getting an invasive enactment into the statute books. It is very significant that the Record is the only Chicago daily that during the continuance of the World's Fair fought against the opening of the gates on Sunday. This fact is another indication of the close confraternity of the Sabbatharians and the other paternalists.

Naturally the Catholic Review, the Independent, the Christian Advocate, and the other Christian papers of the city rejoice at the example the Police Commissioners are setting; it is shown that it is possible to enforce, for a time at least, a law not desired by a large majority of the people of a great city, a law put into the code by rural legislators who care only for the approval of their pagan constituency, and this gives the religionists good grounds for hoping that the Sunday law and other similar theocratic statutes can be forced upon the people of every state by the majority of country voters, who are necessarily much more under the influence of the clergy than are the cosmopolitan populations of the cities.

It is very hard to have patience with such a paper as the Independent when it talks of the jeopardizing of the "rest" day by the open saloon. It says that the legalized saloon "would be only the beginning of the establishment of the European Sunday [that bugaboo again]. Other lines of business would gradually be drawn into the new custom, and traffic would be continuous, knowing no Sunday or Monday, only at best the legal holidays." Does the Independent think that this is going to catch the support of the "laboring class" for Sabbatharianism? If its argument is sound, then the museums and art galleries should be closed, the news-stands swept away, the confectionery and ice-cream and oyster saloons shut up, and all the transit lines forbidden to operate on Sunday; for, if they are permitted to do business, will they not gradually draw all other lines of trade and industry "into the new custom"? The truth is, as so often demonstrated in these columns, all these accessories of modern civilization must be accessible to the public on Sunday if the "laboring class" is to have a rest day at all, and it is not too much to say that the Independent knows this just as well as we do, and that its editor had the fact in mind when he wrote what we have quoted concerning the "rest" day. What, then, is the secret of his attitude and utterance, do you ask? Simply this, that the Independent wants and is working for a Puritanical Sunday, and is now making a special effort against the Sunday saloon merely because the saloon seems to be at present the most vulnerable to attack. It understands the value of the strategic policy of dividing the enemy's forces. When it admits that the secular holidays would probably survive the inroads of the torrent of continentalism it gives its whole case away. Our present laws do not punish people for working or playing on those days, and yet the vast majority rest. Take away your impertinent statutes, and demand will determine what needs to be supplied on holidays, as well as on other days. There are more workers than there are places, and it is always easy to give those who labor on Sunday another day for rest. But this would not suit the Sunday worshippers, for they want everything else to come to a standstill on Sunday so that the church can have full swing.

Do not be deceived by the optimists who, with their eyes shut, declare that there is no danger. Do not be deceived by the apparent anxiety of the Puritans for the wage-worker's rest day; they fought just as bitterly against the Sunday opening of the Metropolitan Museum of Art in this city as they are now fighting against liberty in other directions; in almost every state they are pressing for laws against all forms of Sunday amusements, and have recently won great victories in three Northern states. Do not be deceived by the outcry against the saloon; the anti-saloon fight is only an incidental skirmish; the delicatessen store as well as the saloon is closed in New York, you cannot get a Sunday shave in California or Illinois or in this state, Massachusetts has outlawed Sunday recreations, and the theocrats demand the stopping of the mails, the Sunday excursion train, the Sunday newspaper, the electric and other lines to the parks and the country. The orthodox Sabbath is first to be forced upon you and after that will come the other measures of the National Reform Association. Demand the repeal of every Sunday law. The Sunday battle is on NOW.

Since the foregoing was written, Judge McAdam, of the superior court, has rendered a decision that greatly simplifies the issue here. On Sunday, July 7th, Maurice P. Quinlan opened his saloon for the sale of soda-water, lemonade, and other "soft drinks." He was arrested for keeping his place open, but Justice Deuel discharged him. Acting Police Captain Young told him that if he opened the next Sunday he would again arrest him. To prevent this interference, Quinlan applied for an injunction to restrain the police. Judge McAdam did not examine the validity of the claim of the applicant to keep his saloon open on Sunday, so long as alcoholic beverages are not sold. He denied the application in a decision that sweeps away all the special pleading of the Prohibitionists, who are clamoring for the Sunday closing of saloons on the ground that the traffic is detrimental to the well-being of the individual who patronizes the saloon. His decision, if upheld by the higher courts, and put into effect by the police authorities, makes the fight a square one between the citizen and the Puritans. Judge McAdam holds that it is an offense under the penal code of the state to sell "soft drinks" anywhere on Sunday, whether in saloons, drug stores, ice-cream parlors, or at street stands. Ice-cream is also barred, but confectionery and fruit may be sold. This illustrates anew the "never-ending stupidity of elected persons," to slightly paraphrase Walt Whitman. Who but a legislator would ever have thought of licensing the sale of lemons and forbidding the sale of lemonade? The uninspired citizen may well despair of ever being able to find out why it is right to sell chocolate drops and wrong to sell chocolate soda. New York's penal code says that you may dispose of peanut bar to the small girl, but if you sell peanuts to the small boy you are in danger of spending a night in the station-house and paying a snug fine in the morning. One might as well go to a lunatic asylum for sound reason as to the average legislature for common sense and justice.

Now, what will our police commissioners do? Here is a superb opportunity for them to "enforce law because it is law." Will they do it? They must, or stand convicted of shameless hypocrisy. "Law is law," you know, gentlemen, and you can not afford to let your "personal feelings stand in the way" of doing your "duty."

Persecutions of Adventists in Tennessee.

For the first three days of this month the circuit court of Rhea county, Tenn., was engaged in trying Seventh-Day Adventists for violation of the Sabbath laws of that state. Nine men were convicted, and fined in sums ranging from $5 to $15. To these sums must be added the costs. Refusing to pay the fines, the eight Adventists were incarcerated in the jail at Dayton. The ninth offender is not an Adventist, but his mother is, and this probably explains his arrest. He is a young man, unmarried, and is the only support of his widowed mother and his mother's sister. He worked in the mines near Graysville during the days the mines were operated, and on Sunday he cut firewood for his mother. This "crime" was committed last winter. It is needless to say that no one was injured by his action, and only very ignorant or very knavish people would seek to punish him for that which deserves praise rather than blame. One other man, not an Adventist, was indicted, but was acquitted on the ground that the work he did was necessary. He was away from home on Saturday, being detained by a storm; he borrowed wood from a neighbor and took it home on Sunday. It is supposed he was indicted for this because he sometimes attended Adventist services, and it was thought a prosecution would frighten him so that he would never join that church. Of all the men in the county who work on Sunday only Adventists, relations of Adventists, or those supposed to be in sympathy with Adventists were prosecuted. This fact would seem to show with sufficient clearness the animus of the actions brought against them. Notice the hair-splitting over "necessity"! The man who carried home the wood to keep his family warm was released, while the young man who came home on Sunday and cut wood to keep his mother warm was convicted on two counts! Hurrah for Tennessee's juries' powers of discrimination! Even our Police Commissioners might learn something from them in the art of dividing the indivisible.

There were several acquittals for want of sufficient evidence, and one mistrial. Some cases were postponed, because of the absence of witnesses, but against the earnest protest of the prisoners, among these a feeble old man of sixty-four, who begged to be either tried or released. "Attorney-General Fletcher left no stone unturned to convict the accused," says the Atlanta Constitution, which heads its accounts of the trials with these insulting phrases: "Posed as Martyrs;" "They Violated Tennessee's Laws."

Of all concerned in these persecutions there is none other for whom we have so little respect as we have for Judge Parks. It is noticeable that the Adventist writers handle him quite tenderly, but we confess that we think the leniency entirely misplaced. To be sure, he remitted the fines of the Adventists convicted last spring and later recommended their pardon, but what else could he do after he had so unequivocally condemned the law under which they were prosecuted? And it now appears from his utterances on this trial that he expected all the Adventists in Rhea county would be thankful for his mercy and thereafter submit to an unconstitutional and invasive law, either sacrificing one day each week to Baal of the Sundayites or stifling their conscientious convictions and working on Saturday. This is quite common with judges; they look at the distorted pygmy of law through a powerful glass and shut their eyes to the colossal figure of Justice that towers far above them. Judge Parks again admits from the bench that these persecuted Adventists are good citizens, working hard and minding their own business; he declares that every dictate of justice and mercy demanded the "leniency" which he showed them on the former occasion, and he expresses his profound regret that again the "law must be enforced—with mercy—but it must be enforced." To us all this regretting business is very nauseating. Judge Parks knows that the "law" is enforced against only a class; he knows that it is flagrantly violative of the rights of citizens of Tennessee, and he knows that it is flatly unconstitutional. Why, then, does he help enforce it? Why does he not resign his position, and do it in such a way that his protest against legalized iniquity will ring from end to end of Tennessee? That would do more for justice than all he can accomplish in ten years on the bench as the weakly protesting tool of bigots. We are not asking Judge Parks to make himself a beggar; we do not believe in useless sacrifice. But if he has the ability and learning that he should have to occupy the position that he does he can earn much more as a lawyer than he can as a judge. Let him show himself a man and cease to perpetrate injustice in the name of law.

Judge Parks thinks that "there can be no division on the question as to whether the law should be upheld." Then why does he not instruct the grand jury to indict the mining companies and railroads, and all the other rich and powerful violators of the law? He says that a court failing to enforce the law "but invites contempt for all law." No, Judge Parks, it is the enactment and enforcement of unconstitutional and unjust laws that serve to bring all law into contempt, and it is the existence of these laws that prevents the enforcement of laws that are protective of the equal rights of the people. More than this, the judge who remains in a position where he must help enforce laws which he admits are unjust, by that action becomes himself an object of contempt to all self-respecting men and women. He who knows the right and does not do it is ten times more culpable than he who does wrong in ignorance of the right. This is why we say that Judge Parks is the most blameworthy actor in the persecutions at Grayville. Many of the persecutors are no doubt ignorant Christian pagans who really believe that they are doing God's service in harrasing their fellow-Christians who believe in keeping the Bible Sabbath instead of the Catholic Sunday as a holy day, but there is no such excuse for Judge Parks. He knows that, no matter what the Supreme Court of the state may have said, the Sunday law of Tennessee is unconstitutional, for in the Bill of Rights he finds this: "No human authority can, in any case whatever, control or interfere with the rights of conscience; and no preference shall ever be given by law to any religious establishment or mode of worship." Which does he regard as the higher law, the constitution or an act of the legislature? And in his oath of office, which did he first swear to uphold?

The Wise Case.

Two weeks ago we reported to our readers that Judge Foster had decided that Mr. Wise should be tried for sending an extract from the holy Bible through the United States mail—he evidently regarding the Christians' sacred book as an obscene work—but since that time we have heard nothing more new in the case until the receipt of the following letter from the attorney:

NEW YORK, July 12, 1895.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I have heard from the clerk of the court in Topeka to the effect that no opinion has been written by Judge Foster in the case of the United States vs. Wise, and as the United States attorney has not kept his promise to send me a copy of his brief, we remain in darkness as to the course of reasoning whereby the learned judge and prosecutor have succeeded in reconciling the inconsistencies of their position.

I have notified the attorney of our intention to appeal, and have written the clerk. This appeal must be brought on before the next term of court, because if it is not Mr. Wise will simply be "railroaded," as there is no dispute possible of the facts. There is need of energetic action on the part of Mr. Wise's friends, because the expenses of bringing on the appeal, irrespective of counsel fees, are considerable, and must be met at the outset.

Very truly yours,

ADOLPH BIERCK, JR.

We do not know that we need to add anything to this statement of facts, or that our doing so would stir up the hosts any more. The situation is, that if Liberals do not want the precedent established that Christians can send the Bible through the mails, while Infidels will be imprisoned for doing the same thing, they must come to the help of Mr. Wise. If we had the money we would do it all ourselves, but we have not got the money. But a dollar or two from each one who is interested would make a more than ample fund in a very short time. Let us have it, please, right off, for it takes money to get justice, and without it Mr. Wise is in great danger.

It must be that the doctrine of hell fire is growing unpopular with God; at all events, he has recently killed a minister in the pulpit for preaching of the sufferings of the damned. Rev. Greenleaf Lee, Baptist, of Double Springs, Alabama, worked himself up very much over the subject, concluding with the quotation from the Bible, "There shall be weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth." He instantly fell to the floor and in a few moments was a corpse. Sensible people will say that he overwrought his nervous system and probably ruptured a vessel of the heart, but as the religionist would never admit such an explanation in the case of a man who fell dead while swearing in a fit of angry passion, we shall refuse to see in the taking off of Rev. Greenleaf Lee anything less than a direct dispensation of providence.

The struggle between modern knowledge and the creeds has assumed a very interesting and instructive form in the Presbyterian church. The Assembly has ordered that all Presbyterian institutions of learning be put under the control of the church. The schools refuse to come; at least, some of them have already voted to remain independent, and it is probable that all will do so. What is to be done? It is clear that the church is right from her point of view; if she is to give her licenses to preach to the graduates of these schools she has a valid claim to say what and how they shall be taught. If her ministers are to preach Presbyterianism it is evident that they must be educated in the doctrines of Presbyterianism. If the church is to maintain her ancient landmarks she must control the education of her surveyors. On the other hand, the schools cannot afford to be bound to the dead and decaying past. In teaching science and literature they must keep up with the march of knowledge. Even Presbyterian parents will not send their children to schools that are hundreds of years behind the age. Referring to the Presbyterian seminaries and colleges, the Minneapolis Times forcefully says:

"Bound absolutely by the Presbyterian creed, they become mere priesthoods for the transmission of ancestral formulas of faith. They are not seats of learning. Learning is progressive. It is a rampant steed that can not be harnessed with lifeless, cast-iron dogmas. It must forever pursue the receding vision of truth. What the immediate outcome will be can hardly be prophesied. But it is safe to say that in proportion as the universal and growing spirit of reason and liberty gains ascendancy, the educational institutions will throw off the restraining hand of the church and become independent."

And what will the church do for an educated ministry? It appears to be inevitable that her creeds must be modified, for it does not seem possible for any Protestant church to build up such a marvelous machine for the control of the human intellect as is the Catholic organization. Nothing but a universal theocracy can keep the world from progressing. The legislator is the last crutch of the church. He may yet set civilization back a thousand years.

In the trial of the Adventists at Dayton, Tenn., ex-Congressman Snodgrass made a speech, in which he asserted his belief that the Tennessee Sunday statute was unconstitutional, the decision of the supreme court to the contrary notwithstanding. He sympathized with the Adventists, but urged them to respect the law, which he believed the next legislature would repeal. He also reminded the Adventists of the scriptural injunction, "Be subject to the higher powers," for "the powers that be are ordained of God." We should say that this was a neat touch, but the American Sentinel says that it was not; that "God has ordained no human power to rule over conscience." Is this so, if the Bible is true? Did not its God forbid the worship of other deities? Did he not forbid the making of images of them, thus in both commands interfering with and denying men's rights of conscience? Did not the Children of Israel carry these commands into effect with fire and sword, and where did Yahveh rebuke them for their cruel zeal? Did not God command the observance of Saturday, and did not Moses, as the "human" agent of God, "rule over conscience" by commanding that the Sabbath-breaker be stoned to death? If this is not so, then the Bible is a false record. And did not Paul, the real founder of Christianity, declare that the preacher of any other doctrine should be accursed? If Paul wrote under the inspiration of God—and will the Adventists dare say that he did not?—then God has in that declaration sanctioned, yes, commanded, persecution for conscience' sake. If Jesus intended by his parables to illustrate his own mission and doctrines—and such has always been claimed by his followers to be the fact—then he affirmed that whosoever would not that he should reign over them should be brought before him and slain. But whatever construction may be put by Christians on these and other like passages, it is indisputable that the Bible has been the authority to which persecutors have ever appealed, and its commands, whether interpreted rightly or wrongly it matters not, have caused the shedding of rivers of blood, and suffering incalculable. If God is omnipotent and all-wise, and if he wrote the Bible, or inspired its human writers, he knew the effect it would have, and therefore designed that it should have that effect. Neither will it do to say that it is God who declares that the "powers that be" are ordained by him, and then try to except the Catholic church or the Tennessee legislature from the enumeration. The text does not say that the good powers that be, the powers that respect the rights of conscience, are from God and the others from the devil. "The powers that be" is inclusive.

News and Notes.

How much I have to write about this week—Edinburgh, Abbotsford, Melrose, Glasgow, Ayr, Loch Katrine, and Loch Lomond. What a procession passes through the mind, majestic, beautiful, fairy-like, that cannot vanish from the halls of memory, and glorifying this wonderful human life of ours.

For grandeur, I do think the city of Edinburgh wears the palm; it is lovely, it is ancient, it is romantic; and other cities are so likewise, but where, in the heart of a vast metropolis, is beheld such a mighty castle towering on such a mighty hill? Two hundred trains rattle by it every day. The foliaged valley glitters beneath, edged by the busiest thoroughfare of the city, Princess street. The Castle seems like some giant of the past, huge and battered, reclining with a kind of imperious disdain of the new life that surges at the feet of its dead empire, an enormous relic of the embattled ages.

On Monday morning, June 17th, in company with Mr. Brown, president of the Secular Society of Edinburgh, and Mr. Dewar, Jr., I climbed the precipitous eminence. As I enter the parade-ground the Highland regiment is at drill, with the music of the bagpipes. The costume is picturesque, and the marching ranks present an animated spectacle, with a dash of old-time war emblazonry. I enter the frowning portals, and wander through the halls, chambers, passages, and dungeons of this memorable stronghold. I look upon the kings' regalia, the swords and armor of celebrated warriors, the great gun built in 1486—a ragged-looking monster compared with the polished and gorgeous emissaries of death we now manufacture—and the tattered banners, in whose silken folds were once the fall and rise of kingdoms.

Time will not permit the enumeration of the hundreds of mementos that adorn this grim sentinel of the ages. From the castle I take my way to Holyrood Palace, at the other end of the long, descending street called High street and Canongate. I pass St. Giles Cathedral, where John Knox preached, and the house in which he lived, gloomy as his own religion. I did not care to go in and view the remembrances of his fanatical career—I have no love for that theological termagant who, if he had been a woman, would no doubt have enjoyed the Puritanic ducking-stool. Holyrood, however, is a poetic place, witnessing in its decaying grandeur to the tragedies of kings and queens. Especially is the brilliant and sorrowful life of Mary mingled with these palatial remnants. The bare walls of the old abbey are all that is now left of that structure in which the beautiful queen was married to the unworthy Darnley, whence began those cruel misfortunes which, crushing to death, have lifted her name into the immortal romance of history, where love and pity forget error and weakness. The dark and terrible crimes of those tumultuous days have left their record athwart the walls and floors of Holyrood, and we traverse the footsteps of royal murder and conspiracy. In the sunlight of to-day float the dim tapestries that might have drunk the blood and tears of centuries ago. Near by the palace is Arthur's Seat, a promontory-like hill, from whence is a spacious view of the city and the vast surrounding country, now glistening in summer's green and flowery pomp.

In the afternoon with Mr. Brown and Mr. Dewar I visit the Forth Bridge. This is the largest and tallest bridge in the world. It is a mile in length; with three mighty arches it spans the waters. It looks like a triple mountain in its symmetrical and massive sublimity. It is built for the ages. It can not be blown down by any wind that these regions can produce. The enormous blast that tumbled over the Tay Bridge did not shake this an inch. It would require an earthquake to dissolve its stupendous frame. Its iron arms might hold a million tons in their clasp. We sail around the bridge and enjoy a full view of its piers, buttresses, and columns that defy the most furious storm. The view from the top of the bridge which lifts its arches 150 feet above the water is extensive and varied. The broad Forth is lined on both sides with wooded and mountainous shores gleaming near and far in the golden sunlight. We return by stage to Edinburgh, and along the route see new and attractive pictures of the city and its suburbs.

Tuesday unfolds a wondrous treasure house, Abbotsford and Melrose. Melrose is forty miles by rail from Edinburgh. At the station the stage is ready for Abbotsford, about three miles away. We travel through a lovely country, the river Tweed glancing upon our vision with the same radiance that enchanted the poet's soul when he lived and loved on its gentle banks. Dismounting from the stage we plunge down through a walled pathway into the delightful valley where the Wizard Scott built his picturesque home according to the fancies of his exuberant genius. We see the very walls he looked upon, the books he read, the window whence he saw, while at his task, the shining meadow and river; the chair he sat in, the desk over which wandered his marvelous pen, the little room in which he found rest at midnight's hour; the pipes he smoked as dreamland hovered about him, and the many treasures he had gathered, illustrious with memories of the past. The noble face of the poet—no canvas and marble declare the intellectual wealth of his gifted brain. How that brain teemed with the wonders of the world—a colossal power making rich forever the pathway of man. And Melrose, fair Melrose, I did not see it in the "pale moonlight," but in the soft and gorgeous summer afternoon—for clouds were in the sky—and a mellow luster fell from the sun, and clothed the old Abbey with a tender radiance; and the scenes all around harmonized with the melancholy beauty of the ruins. A graveyard is about the Abbey, beautiful with blue and golden flowers and a carpet of grass. I walked among these gray sepulchers, beside the gray walls of the shattered and mossy temple, plucking the flowers just bursting into bloom. The majestic past for the time possessed my being, and the dead centuries became alive and their glory thrilled my heart. I am glad, however, that I did not live when this old Abbey was in its prime. I am glad that I have the privilege of looking upon its ruins, and wondering what its history might have been in the forgotten ages. I have photographed its picture in my mind, and its sad and sweet desolation becomes an intellectual joy.

I return to Edinburgh and pass the night at the home of Mr. J. F. Dewar, naturalist. He enjoys rural felicity if any one does. He lives in a farmhouse, old and solid as the hills almost, and surrounded with gardens, green fields, and beautiful trees. Birds of various plumage are gathered here, and other species of life interesting to the student of nature. It is a delightful place for dreams and reveries, away from the busy multitude. In the evening we enjoy the music of the violin and the piano and the melody of favorite Scottish songs. Mr. Dewar has for years been a staunch supporter of Freethought in Edinburgh, and at the last National Conference he was elected vice-president of the National Secular Society in recognition of his eminent services. As a naturalist and man of science he has no use for the supernatural. I enjoyed the campaign at Edinburgh. There is a fine society here; the audiences are good. The hall is well-filled in the evening. Mr. Brown presides at the afternoon lecture, and Dr. Crawford at the evening lecture. Dr. Crawford himself takes the platform occasionally and speaks a word for reform, although occupied with the cares of a busy profession. He is associated with the great medical colleges of Edinburgh. The Secular Society has much local talent. J. M. Wheeler, Mr. Robertson, and others of renown in the Freethought ranks began their work in this city. Edinburgh is the seat of learning. Over five thousand students are at its university. It might well be called the modern Athens. It is an ideal place for study and philosophy. Here is the tomb of David Hume and his spirit still reigns in the schools, and even in the churches. With the charm of the past, Edinburgh has still the inquiring mind. The warm welcome I have received here, the many beautiful and grand scenes I have witnessed, make Edinburgh a memorable experience in this summer's journey.

On Wednesday, June 17th, I take the train early for Glasgow, for now the Pilgrim would wend his way to one of the sweetest spots in all of Bonnie Scotland, the birthplace of Robert Burns. I met at Glasgow James McGlashan, president of the Glasgow Society, and Mr. Leiper, and they are my companions on this day's journey. Ayr is about forty miles journey from Glasgow, on the Firth of Clyde. It is now quite a prosperous and fashionable resort, and has but little of the simplicity and rural quietness of Burns's time. The old landmarks are almost covered up. Tom o' Shanter's Inn still abides, but it has a brusque and modern appearance. At the Plough Inn is the drinking-cup of Souter Johnnie, and some of the furniture of the cottage where the poet was born. They used to allow strangers, and especially Americans, to drink out of that famous cup, the source of so much happiness to Souter Johnnie; but now it is put under lock and key. It is too valuable to be handed promiscuously about. We can only take a look at it and dream of its sparkling glory in the dim past. The birthplace of the poet is about three miles from the city, a low, long cottage. The poet was born in a little square corner of what I suppose was the kitchen. There seems hardly room enough in that bed for a woman to give birth to a child, but so it was that Scotland's greatest genius saw the light of day, and not much light at that, for there are only two windows in the room, one in front and a very small one in the rear, close by the bed. So the little fellow did not look upon a world of very great promise as he opened his eyes and the tragedy of existence began, mingled with flowers of love and flashes of wit and humor that will cheer to the end of time. In another room, which was perhaps the best room, or parlor, are relics and treasures of the poet's changeable life, his letters, manuscript of "Tam o' Shanter," etc. Among these, on a newspaper cutting, was "A Stranger's Tribute to Robert Burns," and signed "An American." To my surprise and delight, these verses, thus treasured in the poet's own home, were the beautiful stanzas written, I believe, in this very house, by Ingersoll, the sweetest tribute ever given to Burns from a kindred heart and genius. But it struck me as wonderfully incongruous that these noble lines should be "The Tribute of a Stranger." I was wondering if those who placed the lines here really know who wrote them, and were a bit afraid of the magic word, Ingersoll; or did they select them for their simple beauty, without any reference to the greatness of the author? It certainly, in this latter case, would show a fine appreciation of a poem that flows like a fountain from the pen of America's most renowned representative. Burns and Ingersoll! how much alike they are in their broad and universal manliness, in their open-hearted recognition of whatever is good and beautiful in the humblest lot. He who loves the poet of Scotland must love the gifted singer of America, who breaks into melody beneath this lowly roof.

From the cottage we wander to Kirk Alloway, where the witches danced, and we stand by the window through which Tam o' Shanter looked and watched the show, while Old Nick played his liveliest tunes. Then we traversed the road along which Maggie did her level best. We ltered on the arch of the "old brig," where Maggie saved everything except her tail. An enthusiastic Scotchman was reciting the poem as we arrived, and the whole picture was placed vividly before the mind. We could see Tam as he whirled the corner and rushed down the road. We could see Maggie as she made that tremendous jump and won immortal fame. Beneath flowed the beautiful river, the river Doon, which Burns has so often celebrated in his songs. Dreamily we watched its limpid course, the green banks, the rose, the woodbine, and the trees glittering in the sunlight. At the monument are the marvelously life-like statues of Tam o' Shanter, Souter Johnnie, and Nance, and it seemed as if we could hear the very music of their laughter and see the humorous light dancing in their eyes.

Returning to Ayr in the afternoon, we went to the shore, where there are beautiful prospects of the Firth of Clyde, the Arran mountains beyond, etc. In the evening we are in Glasgow. With Mr. McGlashan I take a long ride through the city on a tram-car, and view some of Glasgow's most fashionable streets, its elegant residences, the Botanic gardens, the cathedral, the university, the tall chimneys, etc. There is much magnificence about Glasgow, notwithstanding its smoky atmosphere. The Great Western Road is especially attractive, with its noble mansions and lovely gardens. It extends straight as an arrow for many miles.

Thursday, June 20th, is another eventful day. The weather is brilliant indeed; clouds and sunshine mingle in glorious array and add to the attractiveness of each. The Trossachs tour is on this day's program, and it is crowded with romance from beginning to end. The splendor of Scott's poetry is over all this region, and we seem to be traveling through enchanted land. I take the train from Glasgow to Callender. Here I mount the stage for the Trossachs. We pass by the foot of Ben Ledi. On our left is Coilantogle Ford, where Roderick Dhu was wounded unto death. Then the sparkling Loch Vennachar spreads before us; and beyond that is the Brig of Turk, and Loch Achray, and towering wild and grand is Ben Venue. Then we plunge into the Trossachs' rugged glen, and coming forth Loch Katrine dances on the view. We leave the coaches and are soon on the bosom of the waters, and the great blue mountains appear, the gray hills, Benn Ann, Ellen's Isle, etc. I am reading the "Lady of the Lake" as the boat moves along the wondrous scenes. I see the very rock where the huntsman's gallant steed breathed his last. I see the precipice which the bold knight ascended, the silver strand where the lady found her prophetic guest. Each glowing line reminds of the brilliant world through which I am passing. The poet's genius glorifies the vast expanse. From Loch Katrine we take stage to Loch Lomond. Ben Vorlich and its companions lift their massive walls before our path, and we seem to be dashing into their rocky chambers. But from their base flows Loch Lomond, and on its fair bosom we pursue our journey. Ben Lomond rears its majestic crest, and crowns the vast and splendid scenery. It is afternoon now, and the golden color is shining along the changing heights and the fields and the valleys. It is a marvelous picture, infinit in variety.

From Loch Lomond we take train to Glasgow, and arrive at eight o'clock. Mr. James Baxter meets me, and we visit South Side Park, the Langside monument, on the spot where the troops of Queen Mary were defeated, and Camp Hill, upon which are some remains of the ancient Roman intrenchments. From this place there is a magnificent view of Glasgow. For miles around we behold the populous city.

I must thank Mr. McGlashan and other Glasgow friends for their generosity and hospitality. Mr. Leiper has presented me with some beautiful views of Scotland, which he has taken in his many travels as a matter of pleasure and art, and these will remind me of the beauty and glory of Scotland. My whole visit has been one of constant delight. The people are sociable and cultivated. They are patriotic, and may well be proud of what Scotland has done in the history of the world, in philosophy, in literature and in freethought. Scotland is progressive. She is not bound to ancient creeds. Her stores of romance do not chain her to the past. Her splendid mountains, her beautiful lakes, her fair fields, her shining shores, crowded with memories of heroic ancestry, are busy also with the life of to-day and resplendent with the triumphs of man's noblest genius. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Deathbed Repentance of an Infidel.

[CONCLUDED.]

One day, standing by the side of my house and thinking, I saw clearly that if I indulged in reasoning I should become an Infidel. I shook my head, stamped my foot on the ground, turned short about and said to myself: "I must not reason; I must believe." I started off, walked two rods, and tried to escape my own thoughts. Whilst reasoning, the thought suddenly came to my mind, "But what were my reasoning powers given me for?" The answer as promptly came, "To use; of course." "Well, then, if I use my reasoning powers to the best of my ability, can God himself censure me?" The answer came again, equally as promptly, "No." "Then," said I, "I will be a free man," meaning by that, separation from the church and absolute liberty to think for myself; realizing at the time a thrill—a pleasurable sensation, causing me to experience a degree of happiness rarely felt. In about two weeks an opportunity was presented to leave the church. After the answer was given, "Nothing against Brother Pikard," I arose, parchment in hand, and approaching the president said, "I have come to the conclusion to withdraw from the Methodist church." I was asked to give the reasons why I adopted that course. I refused to do so, saying that I had had no difficulty with anybody in the church, but that the liberty of thinking induced me to do so.

I delivered to the president my parchments, withdrew from the house, and went home. Then I sat down in my chair and said to myself, "Now, what am I?" I answered, "A man, five and a half feet high, can see so far and no farther, can understand so much and no more. I am satisfied that something is true and that whatever is true is reasonable; therefore, having laid my theology on the table, reason must be my guide. It is either possible for me to know the truth, or it is not. If it is not possible for me to know the truth, then I shall never be justly censured for not knowing it. If by the use of any means in my power I can know the truth, then a moral obligation arises to use those means. Now, what means have I by which to know the truth?" I cast about and concluded that to know what means or faculties I have by which to know the truth, I must first know myself. Now, the question again came up, What am I? I answered, "All I am is under my skin. I need not go abroad to study myself. I am here. Now, what are my faculties by which to know truth from error? First, I have five senses, the primary medium of knowing anything. Without them I could know nothing. Second, I have a brain. My senses are the medium of instruction to the brain. The brain is evidently a multiple organ, and of course its faculties have different functions, and it is important to know something of these functions." Here I paused to think and study the brain. In so doing the idea of Mr. Lincoln and his cabinet came to my mind, that whatever of national importance came before the cabinet, Mr. Lincoln was president. I applied this to the brain. After studying it somewhat thoroughly, I came to the conclusion that reason was president of my intellectual cabinet, and hence must make the final decision. Upon this reflection, I decided that all truth is reasonable. If so, it follows that whatever is unreasonable is untrue. Then again, it follows that reason is our only sure guide to truth. Then I began the restudy of theology by commencing to read the Bible carefully, thoughtfully, and understandingly, questioning everything. Having decided that all truth is reasonable, I made reason my crucible into which I put every point of doctrine to determine its quality. The first question therefore that came for consideration was the existence of a God. In order to consider that question faithfully, I made this interrogatory, "Is it conceivable that there ever was a time when there was nothing?" My answer was, "No." Then the question was suggested, "Why not?" "Because it is inconceivable that nothing should ever produce something. Hence it follows that something must have been eternal. Everybody must see how vain it is to inquire, Who made what is eternal, or where did it come from? There every man must stop." Then the question arose, What is that something? Theology says God; Skepticism says matter. Now the question of the eternity of that something is settled, for the question of who made God is as pertinent as who made matter. What is eternal never was made. Now, the question of eternity hangs between God and matter. The first on trial then at the bar of reason is God. He is claimed to be infinit in power, wisdom, and goodness. These attributes amply qualify him to plan and carry his plans to infinit perfection without the least jar or contrariety. If therefore anything takes place within his domain that he does not want, it must be because he sees that some things, at least, that he does not want are better than those he does want. With infinit wisdom to plan, infinit power to execute, and infinit goodness to prompt the execution, if nothing happens but what he wants, then sin is non est, and therefore God can not be displeased with his own work. Now, the only conclusion is, If anything occurs that he does not want, it must be by his voluntary permission, and whosoever permits a crime, having equal power to prevent as to permit, is a criminal; or, as the Bible says, "He that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin." As to the personality or attributes of God, no one knows anything, and his very existence is a matter of inference from the wonderfulness to man of the things he beholds, and therefore God is simply an ideal and not real. Infinit wisdom can make no mistakes, infinit power can make no failure, infinit goodness can permit no evil; therefore, whatever is, is right, but observation and experience show that innumerable evils exist. The destruction by flood and famine and pestilence of thousands and millions of human beings is incompatible with infinit love and goodness.

Now to return to the consideration of matter. It is universally admitted by expert chemists that matter consists of some sixty-four simple elements, which they affirm to be indestructible and therefore suggestive of their eternity. In matter there is no moral law, and hence with her there is no transgression. Natural law is simply known from the properties of matter and always acts in the same direction, therefore needing no administrator. Now, I appeal to the good sense of every thinking man, whether it is not more reasonable to affirm eternity of something of which we know all we do know, than to affirm it of an ideal of whom or which nothing is absolutely known, and the whole of science consists in the knowledge of natural law.

The great argument in favor of the existence of a God is that of Dr. Paley, who assumed that nature exhibits design, and consequently there must be a designer, and that designer must be God; that, when we examine nature we see through it all marks or indications of design in the leaves of the trees and the finishing of the flowers. The question arises here, Is not the animal world composed of matter, and if so, do not they design their own nests? Do not birds design where, when, and how to build their nests? Does not the bee design the form of its comb, and the size and form of its own cells, and whether they shall stand upon end or lie upon their sides? If the tusks and paws of the lion, and all the like weapons of the numerous carnivorous animals, which evidently indicate design, including the claws of the eagle and the hawk, then does not the design of the designer appear in the destruction of the defenseless and harmless animals? If so, then how could the designer be infinitely loving and merciful? Was it the wolf, the lion, the tiger, the leopard, or the hyena that was the object of his infinit love, rather than the lamb, the fawn, the calf, the colt, the zebra, or the chicken? The Bible, in describing the relation of cause and effect, says: "The good man, out of the good treasure of his heart, bringeth forth good things, while the evil man out of the evil treasure of his heart, bringeth forth evil things;" therefore, if God is possessed of infinit love, how could he design the destruction of the innocent and harmless by the vicious and cruel?

It would be a strange event if God, infinit in power and wisdom, were to create a being like man, and require of him to know the truth, and give him no faculty by which to apprehend it. If he has given to man the faculty of apprehending truth, what is that faculty? In the examination of the human head by the best authorities, such as Professors Mahon, Upham, and others on intellectual philosophy, they concluded that the faculty which determines eternal truth is the reason or the reasoning faculty. Reason, then, is the essential faculty by which to discover truth. Every man is favored with that faculty; hence, it is by the same faculty that every man is to determine what is truth. It is by that faculty that we are to determine what truth is to-day or what was truth two thousand years ago, or at any other age of the world. Truth is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, and is to be determined by the same faculty. The principles of nature are as eternal as nature herself. Truth is a principle, not an event, and as a principle is eternal. Therefore, every generation has the same faculty of determining truth as any former generation. The present generation cannot be held accountable for what happened in any former age, but only for what relates to itself. Every man is related to the same fundamental principle. That fundamental principle is reason, whether it relates to what was a thousand years ago or what is to-day. He carries with him the faculty for discovering truth, hence he is not dependent on the opinions of any former age. Every man is responsible for the proper use of his own reasoning faculty. As reason can be employed alone upon what we know, it follows that it is the duty of every man to know all he can. As Pope says:

Of God above, or man below,
How can we reason, but from what we know?

Now, as Christianity is the question under consideration, it is well to begin at its root. The fall of Adam, or what is known as original sin, is the root of the Christian religion. This fall, or this original sin, consisted in the eating of a fruit from the tree of knowledge, which the serpent had promised them would make them as "gods, knowing good and evil." Anxious to know something and seeing the fruit was good for food, they accepted it from the serpent. Instead of the serpent lying to them in saying they would become as gods knowing good and evil, it is shown by God himself, in a few verses after, that the serpent told the truth, for God said, "Behold man is become as one of us, to know good and evil." Now the death threatened Adam for eating an apple of knowledge, was either the result of the natural properties of the fruit, or it was the infliction of a penalty. As the offense was a moral one, it could not have poisoned the physique of Adam and Eve so as to be inherited by their posterity; hence the conclusion that it was a penal infliction, the justice of which is very doubtful. The curse pronounced upon Adam and Eve is in proof of the fact of the infliction of the penalty upon their posterity. What justice can there be in the infliction of penalties upon them for offenses committed thousands of years before they were born, especially when that sin was but the eating by their ancestors of an apple of knowledge, thereby learning the difference between right and wrong?

The First Steamboat.

A statement my friend Putnam makes in his "News and Notes" from Scotland in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 6 demands notice: "Here also is the obelisk erected to the memory of Henry Bell, who was the first to apply steam power to water navigation. I must confess that I always thought that Fulton was ahead of the world, but it seems that he was not. America must yield the palm to Scotland. Bell launched his steamer Comet, three horse-power, on the Clyde in 1812."

No doubt Bell launched his steamer at this time, but on the 1st of September, 1807, Fulton made his first trip up the Hudson in the Clermont. Losing, in his "Field Book of the Revolution," gives quotations from the Albany Gazette of the same date proving this. Fulton was not the first to apply steam to navigation, but he was the first to do so successfully. As early as 1803, while in France, he constructed a small steamer on the Seine, and was successful. An experiment with steam was made on the Clyde in 1789, but the year before this John Fitch, in America, was equally if not more successful. Thomas Paine was a friend of Fitch, and to the author-hero he owed many of his ideas. Bell was the first to successfully navigate by steam in the United Kingdom, but not in the world.

FRANKLIN STEINER.

Observations.

This year, as last, I spent my vacation time as a marine animal of prey. It is not every landsman who has an opportunity to go down to the sea in a ship without buying a yacht, working his passage, or paying his fare, and so there are few who know the advantage of freedom from these details. I related at some length, a year ago, my experience as a passenger on board the fishing schooner Gertrude Summers on a trip to Five Fathom Bank, off the coast of New Jersey, along with Captain Silas Latham and his crew. I have just made the same sort of voyage with the few variations which I shall mention. On that occasion the elements smiled upon us and we had fair weather, though the vessel pitched a trifle in a swell worked up somewhere to the southeast. This time the wind and water and clouds used their combined influence to do us up. Again, then the fishing was good, and the men made casts of the net that gave a show of probability to the miraculous draughts attributed to the apostles, who were aided by inspiration. Nothing like it had occurred before in their experience, and so they set me down as a mascot; but in the year 1895 the combination was changed, and if I had signed as a Jonah nobody could have complained that I did not bring out all there was in the part.

We inaugurated the trip on the afternoon of July 5th. I got the location "inaugurated the trip" from Sailor Bill Brown, who, I think, will bear testimony that it is approved maritime parlance. The Gertrude Summer has grown too small for Captain Latham's business, and has therefore been sold and replaced by the E. P. Wright, which is some forty per cent larger. By reading the name in the foc's'le hatch I perceived at once that the captain had changed boats. I am very expert in identifying boats when the name is in sight. The Wright is a whale among fishing craft, and the smacks lying alongside looked like half grown chickens roosting next to a hen. At Gowanus, on the Brooklyn side, we took aboard as much ice as would load a half dozen of the wagons that perambulate New York with two horses to draw them and two men to do the cheating in weight; and then, induced by a tug with a strong tow-line, we slid forth into the offing. With fifteen men to assist in the solemnities, the making sail on the Wright is not a protracted ceremony, but while they last the proceedings are suggestive of setting up a stove during an earthquake. It struck me as strange that on so large a deck there was no place where a spectator could stand and view the exercises, but anyone who has tried to strike an attitude in the middle of the floor while the company was dancing the Saratoga will understand about how often I got jostled. At such times passengers on fishing smacks should be made secure with an adequate cord and temporarily towed at the stern. A door which everybody wants to pass through simultaneously has its disadvantages as a loafing place, but it is a graveyard for undisturbed repose compared with a vessel's deck when sail is making in a fresh breeze.

After the sails were all up and laced tight as a corset, we went thrumming along toward the Narrows. I have crossed New York harbor so many times that I no longer get excited at the view which it presents. Still, with all its islands and shores and forts and summer residences, it is worth looking at to anyone who has never seen the Mersey, the Clyde, the Erie canal, nor the Chicago river. I noted the statue of Liberty, whose attitude recalled the familiar sight of Mrs. M. turning out the gas, and I also saw several distinguished yachts, including a big steam yacht, half the size of an Atlantic liner, worth two hundred thousand dollars or more. Steam yachts are often so large and commodious in these days that living aboard of them is almost as enjoyable as staying at home. They equal a canal boat in this respect, but exceed it in running expenses.

Half way across the outer bay a squall met us and hid surrounding objects from view. The wind which accompanied the same came at us over the bow, and words spoken in the face of it went back down the orator's throat. The sails were trimmed close aboard, so that from the lee rail they looked like the gill-works of a great fish. Small craft, and even pilot-boats, were soon observed to be dropping or shortening sail to evade the knock-downs of the intermittent gusts, and aboard the Wright there was talk that it might be too rough for us to go outside the bay. An excursion steamer with anglers aboard, driven inside by stress of weather, lay near the Staten Island shore, and passengers crowded the rail to get their hooks in the water, though fish are about as scarce at that particular point as they are on the roof of a house. Our vessel held on with all her linen spread, and the way she crashed into the waves and sent them fleeing away into the gloom was something awful and mysterious to me. Standing at the weather side of the wheel, I could see our great bowsprit go poking off up into the air, there to describe arcs of circles and then come down with a swoop that buried stays and foot-ropes in a fathom of foam. Whereat the stern was whisked like the tail of a wet duck, and the dripping bowsprit arose for another whack at the sea, while the spray flew high aloft and blew away on the gale. Meanwhile the cook's whistle sounded, and the passenger was invited to go forward and "feed his face," which he cheerfully did.

I was quartered at night in a wide berth, which I wished was narrower on account of the difficulty I had in keeping in the middle of it. I was advised that a spread-eagle pose was best adapted to rolling ships, and found this to be true as long as I remained awake to think, but as the directions were forgotten during sleep, I often awoke to find myself "chucked" from port to starboard and back again with a violence that made my bones ache. Among other things, a happy thought struck me; I curled up, and the problem was solved. Others may have done the same at other times, with equal success, but the result of their experiments has not come down to me; I hit upon this method working independently, and it has for me all the importance of an original discovery.

Morning brought no change in the weather. The sky still leaked, and we continued to split the wind. One consolation in having the wind dead ahead, the captain philosophically remarked, was that it could not change to our disadvantage, whichever way it hauled. I fed my face (nautical for ate) thrice that day, and answered the fourth call to the cook's quarters, but upon confronting the table I learned that the interior department of my system had suspended business for a while; the follicles, I inferred, had struck, and consignments of grub would not be received until further notice. For the time being I must be content with half a fisherman's luck. Having chewed a piece of biscuit until it attained the dimensions and consistency of a loaf of unbaked bread, I went on deck and thence to the cabin. I would have smoked, but somebody had apparently put tar in my tobacco, and I concluded to wait. Picking up one of W. Clark Russell's sea stories, I began to read, and got along very well until the hero lit his pipe, and that finished me. I then knew at once that the brain had been sidetracked and that mental impressions were going direct to the liver, whence they were referred to the esophagus and duodenum, which had an unsettled district between them. I drifted from the chair to the locker beside my bunk, laid my head upon a coil of tarred rope, sighed deeply, and asked myself, Can this be death? A few minutes later I turned in. Then the vessel, seemingly, had me right where she wanted me, and I could feel her gathering for a great leap. But she fooled me, and instead of jumping she settled back with a swooning collapse. Down we dropped for a thousand fathoms, as I estimated the distance, when by a rotary jerk, as a man centers a dose of pills in the palm of his hand before swallowing them, I was reduced to an inert mass in the middle of the mattress and sent spinning skyward. When sense returned I lay with my ear to the side of the ship and heard the water as it meanly giggled and snickered past. Sleep or death overcame me. In a world of darkness for interminable ages I wrestled with illegible manuscripts filled with unceasing repetitions, and wrote forever without getting anything done. At 4:30 in the morning I took my swollen and empty head on deck and soaked it in a bucket of sea water. So ended all the trouble I had on this trip.

The sun is not so early a riser as Captain Latham. While Morn still slept in her bed of mist he had his boats out and was waiting for a school of fish to come up where he could get his seine around them. Meanwhile I baited a hook and fished over the side of the ship, then anchored on Five Fathom Bank. This is a great fishing ground. Its northern and southern limits are indicated by the presence of government lightships, and about midway between these a keg is anchored for the guidance of the fishermen who come off from the Jersey shore. This keg is not visible for more than a quarter of a mile on a clear day, but the Jersey men can find it in a fog, though they must row miles and miles from where they launch their boats. On this particular morning the fog was at times as thick as a bunch of cobwebs, but out of it came the leader of the fishing skiffs and split the anchor rope of the keg with the bow of his boat. And he never missed a stroke of his oars or turned his eye to look ahead. I do not expect ever to have any better luck angling than I had that morning. My line had two hooks on it, and often before the sinker could carry them to the bottom I was obliged to haul in and pick a three or four pound sea bass off each of them. At any other than the vacation season sport like that would be called work. At length the fish seemed to have got on to my game and sheered off, upon which I began feeding them with bait after the fashion of church organizations doling out charity to excite admiration and hook members. The fish on Five Fathom Bank have hard lines. I am informed that those not foolish enough to bite a hook often go in seine.

The seine used by Captain Latham is a very comprehensive affair. If would reach the ground from the top of one of our eight-story buildings and would go all around some Western cities I have visited. The only hope for a fish is to make a dive and come out under the purse-line before it is hauled in. Among other additions to his gear, Captain Latham has a pocket net into which the fish are placed after being caught in the seine; it is then boomed out over the rail of the schooner, and the fish enjoy life until they are scooped on board and placed kicking on the ice. Left in the water thus bunched together they are tempting bait for sharks, which are inclined to make dashes at the prisoners and, breaking the twine, set them at liberty. As I stood watching the pocket one day a shark as big as a coffin dropped alongside and cast a critical eye upon the porgies and sea bass that had turned up their toes and were floating. I advanced my beaming countenance over the rail and he dropped out of sight as though he had all at once turned to a leaden sinker. His place was soon taken by a smaller fish of the same species, so persistent that the cook had to get out a spar and jab it at his head before he would go away, and even then he retreated tail foremost, cross-dog fashion. The shark is admired least by those who know him best. He is a natural born outthroat and thief.

The exertions of the captain and crew were not rewarded with their usual success, and when the time came for returning to New York the catch of fish was several tons short of making the trip a good one. The captain apologized for the size of his cargo, but I assured him that it was not worrying me in the least. I was not concerned with considerations involved in the mad pursuit of wealth. My interest was in the voyage itself. We had experienced all the vicissitudes we could reasonably expect. Rain, wind, and other natural phenomena had displayed themselves and acted their little parts for our benefit. Myself had been especially favored. The ship proved herself staunch, the crew showed great urbanity, cordiality, and versatility of language; the cook set forth plum duff with the raisiest side next to me, and the captain had given me the benefit of much profitable discourse. Over and above this, here we were on the boundless main, a fair wind blowing, every sail pulling like an ox team, and no other member of the fleet in it with us in the race up the coast. Furthermore—

Behold the scene around us spread—
The sun that slowly sinks to rest
Upon old Ocean's billowy breast,
Yet leaves his wake of gold and red;
The glory of the gorgeous west
On all that lies before us shed.

And lo! the stars appear in turn;
The moon, a mass of liquid flame,
Springs from the sea, and o'er the same
Her thousand silvery candles burn.
Well might their radiance put to shame
A large electric light concern.

But nearer still, with luster bright
As that on Sandy Hook which glows—
Behold it ere your eyes you close—
Serenely through the dark of night,
That deeper, redder, steadier light
Effulgent from my sunburnt nose.
How many fish do you suppose
Could pay the loss of such a sight?

I keep my poetic nature close under hatches nowadays, but at times I cannot refrain from bursting forth into song. I was gratified to learn, before parting with Captain Latham and the crew of the Wright, that owing to the superior condition of their cargo and the scarcity of porgies in the market, their fish would bring a fancy price; and there was money as well as excitement in the trip after all.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

Do the temperance people rejoice in the Sunday tyranny? Possibly, and yet the results are not in the direction of the propagation of temperance. On the contrary, if a man who supposes he must have a tippie on Sunday cannot get it at his accustomed place, and is forced to lay it in on Saturday, he buys a bottle of course. And then he uses the whole bottle, while otherwise his regular one or two drinks a day would satisfy him. Drunkenness thus becomes systematic.—N. Y. Morning Journal.

A Bigoted Editor Called Down.

Following lectures in Walsh county, North Dakota, by Remsburg, Putnam, and myself, quite a controversy has arisen. The editor of the Park River Gazette-Witness republished my article from THE TRUTH SEEKER, and has taken up the cudgels for the orthodox. Mr. E. Smith-Petersen replied to him in the Gazette-Witness of July 5th, and in the same issue are found some notes by the editor, to which I will direct a few words. Regarding the local and personal side of the controversy I have nothing to say, leaving that for local friends, who are able to defend themselves. The editor of the Gazette-Witness has been one of the most intolerant opponents of Freethought in Park River, yet, to the surprise of all, he has never attended a lecture. He gives his reason for this in these words: "Thirty years ago, or, say, just the time Mr. Petersen was first wrapped in swaddling-clothes, the editor of this paper began to examine the subject of the inspiration of the scriptures, the divinity of the Christian religion, and kindred themes, and has been a reasonably diligent student ever since, keeping fairly up with the thought of the day." Whether he attends or not is his own business, but, like many other Christians who never go near a Freethought meeting, he knows more about Liberalism, Deism, and Atheism than any one else, Liberals included. The most unjust judges have prided themselves on their "impartiality," and the most ignorant man often prates about what "he knows." Fortunately, we have enough of the Gazette-Witness editor's productions before us to enable us to take his statement for just what it is worth. We find him well-versed in the ordinary Christian platitudes of this and past ages, with the most commonplace Christian ignorance of Freethought, seasoned by the venomous bigotry for which the followers of the Nazarene are noted. From some of his statements, we are inclined to believe that he yet wears his swaddling-clothes.

"Messrs. Putnam, Remsburg, and Steiner," he says, "are but feeble echoes, parading ideas which have been more cleverly clothed by other men." What a mountain of logic! So has Christianity been clothed more cleverly by men other than the Gazette-Witness editor and the preachers of the present day. Everything the editor here says, including his errors, are but the "feeble echoes" of others. This argument would prove Christianity the most worthless religion in the world. To say nothing of its age as an organization, it represents the "feeble echoes" of both extinct and living pagan religions. A little study of comparative religion would convince our editor of this fact. Some Christians use queer reasoning when they assume that the truth of an idea depends upon its age. The next statement is a wonder in its way: "There is not an argument against Christianity of any force or point, in all the repertoire of either of these gentlemen, but finds its real paternity in that old Epicurean Celsus, who lived, wrote, and died seventeen hundred years ago." We are not surprised at this statement, when we know that it comes from a man who made his investigations thirty years ago, and knows so much of the subject to-day that he need not attend a lecture. The "learned" editor probably does not know that Christians destroyed the works of Celsus, and all we have of his writings are the brief extracts preserved by his opponents. All Freethinkers are doubtless aware of the fact, now boldly announced by the Gazette-Witness, that their lecturers pay no attention to the history of the last seventeen centuries, their literature and development, nor to the scientific discoveries and philosophical reasoning of Spencer, Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, and others of the present day! But they look blindly back to Celsus as a guide! We will not deal harshly with the superannuated editor of the Gazette-Witness for this cheap revival talk, but for his guidance in the future I will refer him to the statement of the Rev. Austin Phelps, D.D., of Andover Theological Seminary: "Modern Infidelity is an intellectual giant in comparison with anything in the Infidel records in the past. It is to the Infidelity of history in many respects what the Copernican is to the Ptolemaic astronomy. It is learned in resources, shrewd in tactics, well informed in Christian argument, vigilant of its weak points, self-possessed in assurance, and, withal, morally earnest in spirit."

We are next told that "callow lads and ignorant men may be staggered by the Brummagem philosophy of these peripatetic platformists." The word "callow" is defined by Webster as "destitute of feathers; naked and unfledged." Very well, Mr. Editor; feathered lads and learned men like yourself seemed to be staggered in Park River, last winter, when you tried to keep us out of the town hall, a building owned by the public and built by the taxes of the Infidel as well as the Christian. You were "staggered" also when you failed to keep the "peripatetic platformist" from speaking, thereby vindicating freedom of speech.

We next note the amusing assertion that Liberals to-day are ashamed of the terms Deist, Atheist, skeptic, and Infidel, "which have an ugly and unwelcome sound," and prefer the "euphemistic" words "Freethought" and "Freethinker." If the editor's ignorance were not equal to his bigotry he would know that "Freethought" and "Freethinker" are general terms, and apply to all who have rejected authority in religion, while Deist, Atheist, and Pantheist are special terms describing the beliefs of different classes of Liberals. You could not justly apply any one of them to the great body that reject Christianity any more than the word Catholic, Presbyterian, or Methodist to all Christians. The editor knows, however, that all reject orthodoxy, and a hideous picture of the Infidel arises in his mind, obscuring all things else. A closer consultation of the dictionary he mentioned would have prevented his falling into a very ridiculous error. Regarding the employment of school-teachers who are unbelievers, we are favored with this piece of editorial wisdom: "This state and this county are overwhelmingly Christian. In the supremely important matter of the education of their children, North Dakota and Walsh county parents cannot be adequately represented by anti-Christian teachers, nor can the children of Christian parents be safely entrusted to the daily care and close companionship of anti-Christian men and women."

Since, Mr. Editor, you are so well posted regarding Freethought that you need spend no more time making investigation, had you not better pay a little attention to the fundamentals of American government, and to right and justice? If I am not mistaken, the Constitution of this country gives no sanction, directly or indirectly, to the Christian religion. The fathers of our nation made it a point to see that religious tyranny should not be sanctioned by the supreme law of the land. Therefore they determined that no matter what might be the predominating religious sentiment, "Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion," and declared that so far as government recognition is concerned, this is no more a Christian nation than a Buddhist nation. Washington declared that this is not a Christian nation in the sense just named, and James Madison said that Congress has no more right to pass a measure affecting the conscience of a single individual than it has to do the same with an entire community. Where this has not been carried out the Constitution has been violated.

Certainly no teacher has a right to instill into the minds of his pupils his particular religious views. He is supposed to have under his care children of all beliefs. The child of the only Infidel in Park River would have the same rights of conscience in the schools as the overwhelming Christian majority the Gazette-Witness mentions. The teacher, then, should instruct them in the secular branches of knowledge, leaving opinions regarding the supernatural to be formed at will. When a teacher does this, certainly his religion should have no more to do with his getting a position than should his politics. The real reason Christians want religion in the schools arises from the fact that unless Christianity is instilled into the mind in childhood, a person will never believe in it. They cannot rely on the mature, unbiased judgment of manhood. If a man is trained from infancy in a certain religion, that is the religion he will cling to if he clings to any. He may give it up, but he is not likely to embrace any other. So if the same man receives a Secular education without religious instruction, he is not likely to embrace Christianity. The priesthood has admitted many times that unless they get the children they are lost. The editor expresses a well-known Christian sentiment when he says that the children of Christians cannot safely associate with Infidels. Association breaks the barriers of prejudice. When Christians really come in contact with Infidels, they may possibly discover that a few things said about the latter by preachers and Christian editors do not conform to the truth. Let us all rejoice that the bigotry represented by the Gazette-Witness is rapidly on the wane all over the world.

FRANKLIN STEINER.

THE TRUTH SEEKER's offer to send eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" to eight different addresses or to one, to be used for missionary purposes, is still open. The best results are reported from this method of reaching intelligent believers and giving a new direction to their thoughts.

Straight Talk.

The constitution of the state of New York declares: "The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship shall forever be allowed" to every member of this state. This is our constitutional guarantee, so-called, for religious liberty. It will be perceived that it is not very broad. It is not abreast with the opinion of the world at large on that subject. It does not put religion in the category of things with which the state has no concern. It does not make the freedom absolute. On the contrary, it is rather a license for each person to choose for himself some one of the religions or forms of worship in use among men, and does not assume that he might reject every one. Our constitution therefore stands for a certain religious requirement, and this requirement is intensified by the declaration that "the liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace and safety of the state." This may mean almost anything, from the Mormon dogmas in regard to multiple marriages to the Puritanical observance of Sunday. It will be noted that it takes a hint from the old-fashioned schemes of tyranny, and proposes to put down all disorder—disorder meaning in all such cases not disorderly things, but things objected to by an intolerant majority. One of the things that our constitution seems to mean is that no man shall ever be so free as to enjoy himself in his own way on Sunday, unless his own way happens to be the way established by our Puritanical ancestors, and if a man will not enjoy his Sunday in that way then any other way of enjoying it is dangerous to the state.

Judge Brown, of the Supreme Court, decides that the Sunday Barber law is "a valid exercise of the legislative power," and therefore is constitutional. But we do not believe that this gross and ridiculous interference with the private life of the citizen can be so justified. Where there is no disorder involved, no wrong done, and no act performed that can by any possibility have evil consequences, the proceeding is not within the sphere of acts that may be regulated by law. It is contrary to the whole purpose and spirit of the constitution. What a judge says settles nothing. In all great cases three judges are on one side and four on the other.—N. Y. Morning Journal.

It begins to look as though we are hereafter to be ruled by "civic federations," "law enforcement leagues," "societies for the prevention of everything we don't like," and "law and order leagues." Why is this? About the first complaint of the average citizen, when this is brought to his attention, is that the legally-elected officers are negligent of their duties, and that they must be held responsible for the enforcement of law. The average citizen says that the various volunteer societies owe their existence to the remissness of the public officers. But is this true? Does not the trouble begin further back? The real source of the evil is the intolerable mania for needless laws. If the average citizen would mind his own business, and compel the man he selects to make laws to do the same, nine-tenths of the incompetency and corruption now justly charged against officials would not be developed. To illustrate what we mean, here is a dispatch from Youngstown, Ohio, which says that at that time (June 24th) the spasm of municipal virtue was relaxing slightly, and the "law-breakers" were again becoming active. What law-breakers? Oh, the proprietors of fruit stands, cigar stores, soda fountains, and the rest of that kind of desperate criminals. The prosecuting attorney "had been called away on business," but before going had announced that he would not try any more Sunday-law cases; if the Civic Federation "wants the suits prosecuted in police courts, it must furnish counsel." In one case there was a bill of costs amounting to $60, and the mayor could find no one willing to pay the bill. All this trouble grows out of inexcusable meddlesomeness. In almost all instances the Sabbatarian crusaders are at the bottom of the business, and they will continue to make trouble and pile up expenses until the American people make up their minds to bury Sabbatarianism and its allied nuisances and invasions for good. Then we will have some peace, and genuine educational reformers can do effective work.

MR. EDITOR: As my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER becomes due the last of this month I had better be hustling with my money if I am going to keep paid in advance, so here it is.

We have a secular society organized in this city at last, or will have, when we elect officers. We are going right along, however, with temporary officers; have held two meetings; have postponed the election of president until next Sunday afternoon. We are in no hurry, and will select officers of whom we can be proud.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 for your paper. I have not received my last three papers for some reason; I wish you would send me copies of them, as I do not wish to miss them. When I belonged to the Methodist Episcopal church and quit them, they kept on sending me their papers, etc., and the preachers called on me for at least seven years after I embraced the faith promulgated by our noble R. G. Ingersoll, whom I very much respect and love. Yours in the cause of Freethought, Ministers Hate Cheap Sunday Travel.

ROCKY RIVER, O., June 30, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In extending subscription six months at a time, it is my intention thus to keep in memory that I live. Although aged, I am still ardently attached to my TRUTH SEEKER; I live and shall die a member of the increasing family of the "mentally emancipated." From Sabbath observations seven miles west of Cleveland, I am impressed with the effect of the modern bicycle and electric power so recently used to hustle tens of thousands into the way-out resorts and parks not dreamed of by the horse car and street railway men of Cleveland three years ago. The "electric current" is to play the devil with the (once) going to church of the young of both sexes. The livery horse and rig are nowhere to long country street car rides at only a few nickels cost.

CHESTER, June 27, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I send you $2 on my subscription. I am sorry I am not able to send you ten times as much, but it seems to be very difficult to get money, even when earned.

It does seem to me that good pay makes a better civilization than mean, paltry pay. It seems to me that we have a wonderful big job on hand to destroy superstition.

I have been reading "Initiatory Element in Progress." It appears to me that there is a big struggle going on in the various churches to once more gain a controlling influence. It is a pity THE TRUTH SEEKER is not more widely read. The ignorance of the people on these subjects is so great, it almost seems to me they know nothing they ought to know, and I am acquainted with no other or better paper than THE TRUTH SEEKER whereby they can learn.

Yours truly, WM. HULTON.

MR. EDITOR: Watts or some one else has said:

While the lamp holds out to burn, The vilest sinner may return, therefore, for fear THE TRUTH SEEKER lamp may cease to give forth its light and I may be deprived of the benefits of its effulgent rays, I inclose remittance to set the figures on tab forward a notch.

I cannot get along without "News and Notes," which I consider worth the price of the paper, and the "Observations" of the "Man with the Badge-Pin," the "Letters from Friends," Mr. Heston's cartoons, and the editorial matter, are worth several times the subscription price of the paper.

Even "Not for Parsons" is good, for of course from the heading that would be the first thing a parson would look at. Hoping all who may be owing oil to THE TRUTH SEEKER lamp may fill the cruse and send it on that the light may continue to shine, I am truly, F. M. KIZER.

Too Bad.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., June 23, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The social evil, which, as everybody but the clergy knows, is an inseparable concomitant of civilization, is now receiving the united attention of the parsons here in this city. With their usual practical ideas of life and society, they see no reason why a city ordinance closing up disreputable houses should not exterminate the aforesaid evil; and on this ingenious and original line of thought they are demanding immediate action on the part of the city council. So much have they all said about this matter that the best advertised street in the city is, by a large majority, Alameda; whereon may be found those unfortunates whom God, in his wisdom, has ordained to lead that kind of a life.

The continued, and, as some seem to think, unreasonable and senseless agitation by the preachers, has led to the publication of various letters in the daily papers on that subject; and I was deeply pained by one from some unfeeling wretch without proper respect for the cloth. He belched forth in this manner: "The course being pursued by these misguided reformers called the 'Ministerial Association' is doing more to corrupt the minds of the young people than they perhaps realize." He then says: "Even preachers sometimes live in glass houses, and they would be credited with more sincerity if there were less lapses from virtue in their own fraternity. At least six preachers, pastors in this city, who were loudest in their denunciation of the social evil, have left under a cloud or been silenced for gross immoralities. Their names can easily be recalled."

I consider it ungentlemanly and impertinent to proclaim such things as these, and it is too bad that he could not have kept them to himself; for the influence of our spiritual guides will not be increased by such disclosures. It is plainly evident that we need a censorship of the press, and I move that one be established at once.

O. SEVERANCE.

Cleanliness Ahead of Godliness.

TRINIDAD, COL., June 29, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find "three of a kind," for renewal of subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I haven't succeeded as yet in getting the Women's Christian Temperance Union to subscribe for it, but one member of this renowned organization, a neighbor of mine, greatly enjoys reading it, and so I hope, through her instrumentality, to obtain the consent of the Union to have THE TRUTH SEEKER appear in the holy shrine of their "free reading room."

Since the disturber of orthodoxy (Mr. Putnam) was here, your paper has been at a premium. A great many people are anxious to read it, but lack the moral courage to take it in their own name, fearful lest their conduct offend some pious mind. This class of humanity are improving, because a few years ago they would not peruse the columns of a Liberal periodical for fear of provoking divine wrath. God would, in infinite anger, see to it that they had appendicitis or an ingrowing toenail.

Verily I say unto you, Trinidad is a great town—a sort of zoological garden. You find a variety of nationality, not unlike a seaport city, and consequently all forms of religious worship. The Catholic, Baptist, Methodist, Christian, Presbyterian, Congregational, Lutheran, Seventh-day Adventist, and the irrepressible Salvationist, are all well-fed here by credulous, admiring votaries. And, just to think of it! among these holy of holies there live a few for whom Reason has promulgated its emancipation proclamation—a few who have the manhood and womanhood to think for themselves, a few who have peeped under the veil of history, and gathered some damaging truths about Christianity and its terrible career of torture and blood, a few who disbelieve in dreams and the astronomical feat of Joshua, a few who believe that, if the biblical injunction, "Be baptized and be saved," had been, "Bathe semi-weekly and be saved," and all the theological Santa Claus worshipers as thoroughly imbued with its importance, there would be more health and happiness, and lucrative employment furnished all the unemployed of our land in the manufacture of soap.

E. F. SQUIRES.

Charity and Mission Work Begin at Home.

SAN PEDRO, CAL., June 21, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: It is through THE TRUTH SEEKER that I make known the plan and give my reply to the proposition of the Methodist Episcopal Church Society at Western, Ohio. They wish to defray the expenses of their new church and to purchase a pipe organ. Under the motto of "God loves a cheerful giver," they say in their circular:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Will you assist us in building our new Methodist Episcopal church in our little village? (we believe you will). We cannot build unless we have assistance. We have purchased a large book, and will enroll every man, woman, child, church society, and Sabbath-school that assists us. Don't you want your name enrolled with us? Send your contributions at once to

H. G. STRAWSER, Secretary and Treasurer.

Those who wish to contribute can, of course, do so, but I fail to understand that it is giving to God and his cause. The truth of the matter is, I don't believe God has any part in the scheme or will get any of the money. No, I am no sucker, as for the past twenty years. Mission and charity work begin at home. No longer am I led by the church and its societies. For many years I was a professor of religion, and held membership

Christian denominations. But this did not satisfy me. I found, upon examining myself, that when I should appear at the judgment I would be weighed in the balance and found wanting if I allowed myself to appear on that great day under the banner of the apostate Protestant church. Rather than live my life out of harmony with the Bible and Christ's teachings, I severed all allegiance to the apostate Protestant church, preferring to appear at the judgment bar either as a worldly man or obedient to God's law.

This circular accompanies the other:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: I have been appointed to solicit funds to purchase a pipe organ for our new church, and am asking my brother jewelers to clean one watch for our benefit. The organ will be presented in behalf of the jewelers of the United States, with their names and post-office addresses attached. Please send me by return mail $1 to help me in this good work, and more if you wish, Brother Stevens. Good cause!

H. G. STRAWSER.

I must decline to contribute money by return of mail for the purpose named. I have replied to Mr. Strawser, but I don't want this proposition kept quiet, but made known publicly.

N. A. STEVENS.

Will Read it, or Have it Read.

WORCESTER, MASS., July 3, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1 to pay balance on my subscription and "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." This will leave fifty cents for which you will please send "Age of Reason" and "Examination of the Prophecies," as many as it will buy. I shall send you the money in a few weeks for my new subscription and Paine's works. I want the "Age of Reason" for some good Christians here. I often have fights with some of them, very often with priests or ministers; most always Frenchmen. Of course I am more at home in French; I can give it to them in pretty good shape. A few days ago I met a French Protestant minister named Paradis, of Lowell. Of course he said I didn't understand the Bible; it was all the best of philosophy. I said, "If you understand it so well can you harmonize it, can you tune that bad old fiddle? Take for instance the genealogies of Jesus Christ by Matthew and by Luke; there are three or four stumbling-blocks there. First, they try to make him come down from the race of David and they come only to Joseph, and they say Joseph was not Jesus's father. Second, according to the Bible, Joseph had two fathers. 'Oh, no,' he said, 'you don't understand it; that man had two names, Jacob and Eli.' 'Then,' I said, 'what about all the others in the two lists; according to that they must all have had two names, and supposing they had, how is it the number of generations does not agree—twenty-eight in one and forty-three in the other?' He said, 'Well, they make him come by two different lines.' 'How can that be?' said I, 'can a man come from his father and from his uncle, too? Even supposing that was possible, yet you are mistaken when you say Joseph's father had two names. If it were two men, or if he had two names, then he (Joseph) did not come by two different lines. What good reasoning, is it not?' He said he would come to my house some day; I am afraid he won't.

I couldn't go without THE TRUTH SEEKER, anyway. I am bound to have it as long as I can read it, and if I should lose my eyesight I would have it read to me.

Yours for truth, liberty, and justice, J. O. BELLEFLEUR.

Reproach Becomes Honorable Mention.

FRANKFORT, MICH., June 8, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I am reminded it would be well to hand in something to apply on subscription for your valuable paper that I have perused with pleasure and I trust with profit for nearly twenty years. Inclosed find $5, and, if it will not be asking too much, send me a copy of Alexander's "Dynamic Theory."

I noticed, in the splendid letter of F. W. Mason, of Brooklyn, N. Y., on page 361 of THE TRUTH SEEKER, of date June 8th, read at the second annual memorial services at the grave of Thomas Paine, that he attempts to define the term "Infidel," which he will pardon me for saying is quite unsatisfactory.

I have been pained many times by a seeming misapprehension of the meaning or careless use of the term, even by critical secularists or Freethinkers. My understanding of the term is, that it is derived from the Latin word fide, meaning faithful, trustful, honest, trusty, loyal, with the prefix in having a negative signification; that the word thus derived signifies unfaithful or not faithful—i. e., one that is not faithful to himself, to another, to a cause, to truth, to principle, to a party, or to mankind.

In a sense, the "Author-Hero of the Revolution" was an Infidel. He was not loyal to dogmas, deities, or devils, and had no faith in, and was not a cringing follower of, senseless forms, ceremonies, and rituals; did not pay allegiance to any priest, prince, or potentate, and would not follow stupid error and ignorance because it was hoary with age.

The term has also another and a corrupted meaning and use, as an epithet; and has long been employed as such. When ignorance, envy, and malice have been disarmed of more dangerous weapons, they have stood off and hurled this epithet at the object of their dislike. Hence Mohammedans always speak of Christians as "Infidel dogs," meaning thereby unfaithful curs, it being the most opprobrious epithet they can formulate in words with which to stigmatize their opposing religionists. And our Christian friends, not understanding the true meaning of the term, have borrowed the same from the East, like many other words, forms, and phrases, and employed it in this corrupted sense to stigmatize those who do not conform to their conception of things.

To be an Infidel to evil, to error, ignorance, corruption, oppression, and tyranny, in church and state, in social and educational institutions, is the most honorable title that can be conferred upon or attained by man. N. A. PARKER.

A Very Good Beginning.

PORTLAND, ME., June 23, 1895.

This is the first piece I have ever tried to write for a paper. Thought I would like to write a few lines for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Liberty and education are what the human race is struggling for to-day. This world should be like a school-house, where the human race should be educated both physically and mentally and prepared to exert a noble power instead of being judged and condemned to hell by ministers and priests.

Robert G. Ingersoll, one of America's most brilliant orators, is to-day teaching the world; he is not afraid to come before the people with his natural and honest thoughts. He is doing more to bring the human race out of darkness and superstition than all the ministers and priests that ever lived. I have no God. I believe the universe, governed by the uncreatable and indestructible laws of nature, always was and always will be. Hence, so far as I can see, the grave is the end of me. I find that, as a general rule, Christians are not very well read in the Bible; not one in a thousand has read the Bible through. And still they believe every word of it.

I was brought up a Catholic and tried to live up to it, but found that I could not. They impressed hell on my mind very strongly. So I commenced to read the Bible for myself. I have read it through twice very slowly and carefully, every chapter of it. The result is that it cleared me from all darkness and superstition. Now I fear no God, no devil, no hell. I treat everybody to the best of my ability, and believe in doing good and helping my fellowmen. We should all help each other. I believe in evolution, change from one condition to another for ever and ever. My body has always been in this universe in some condition or form, but I have no remembrance of being in any form except the present one.

God, according to the Bible, made the world, and if the Bible is true he made a failure of everything he undertook to do up to the birth of Christ. And that was one of the most disgraceful things of which I have ever read or heard. God committed a crime, and then divided himself into three parts, God the father, God the Holy Ghost, and God the Son. God committed adultery with Mary through the holy ghost, who is Christ's father. Christ is God's son, therefore God must be his own grandfather. It seems from this point that God has taken a back seat and let the holy ghost and Christ struggle with the world. There is no doubt but God felt somewhat weak after he divided himself into three parts. So, in order to get some of his strength back, he had the Jews murder his son under the pretense of saving the world. I think the Christian religion will die out, and when it does the three-times-one-is-one and once-one-is-three Gods will die with it. HENRY SHAW.

Equal Suffrage.

CAMBRIA, KAN., July 3, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Popularity and Prejudice are two overgrown twins of the Nineteenth century, whose parents are Ignorance and Credulity. But reason and logic dispense with both of them. Hence if we would reason correctly on any subject we must put aside prejudice, hear both sides of the arguments, and accept nothing that has not facts to sustain it.

Positive and negative forces pervade all space, every atom of the universe, and where one is not the other cannot exist, and for an undertaking to be a success both must be present—whether it is of a material, moral, or governmental character. They balance one the other, hence a government cannot long exist for both unless both are represented. In this government only one of these forces is represented—the positive or masculine—hence disorder, corruption, and injustice result. This must always be the case when one of these forces is wanting. We are not sympathetic in our appeal, neither are we tyrannical in our demands. Science and logic, experience and reason, facts and theories, evidence, and conclusions therefrom derived, support us. Could our shackles be removed for one century, what a change there would be in the intellect of human beings, for this change, through the laws which govern reproduction, would evolve much better young men, who would come into being with the attributes of self-reliance, independence, and common sense. Then there would be no use for monopolies to keep expensive lobbies at Washington, for there would be statesmen there that no oppressor of the poor could buy.

A free woman will raise free sons, whom policy cannot control, for the liberty she enjoys will be defended by her offspring, and they will feel free to act as their reason dictates, and in perfect freedom they will have no other aim than that of justice. It is as impossible to raise free men when woman considers herself man's inferior as it is to mix oil and water. There are laws in nature that govern the intellect as well as the body, and any interference with them forestalls the desired results. This is one of the reasons why woman should have political liberty, something to exercise all her mental faculties, for only by their exercise can they be enlarged and transmitted to her offspring? Can men afford to overlook this great and self-evident truth? Is not the march of progress slow enough, at the best, when we act in harmony with nature's laws? Then, why cripple her instead of helping her help on human development? Life is short, and can last but a season, and he enjoys it most who helps to broaden the skirts of liberty, thereby enhancing his own happiness by elevating reason and justice to a higher plane. We must agree with Ingersoll that "man is not yet civilized," for when he is civilized enough to treat his wife as his equal, to be kind to her who is adding bud and blossom to his household as he is to the thoroughbred animals in his fields, then he will raise thoroughbred men and women, sons and daughters of whom to be proud. When he is civilized enough to make motherhood a blessing instead of a curse, by enslaving the mother, womanhood a blessing instead of a crime to be punished by disfranchisement, then he will rear sons of philanthropy and daughters of economy, who will study how to save instead of spend the dollars.

Should man expect aught but extravagance from one he has made dependent on him, and the boundaries of whose research are home, society, and fashion? "Support me" is the language of wedded inequality; "we will work together for the good of the nation and our home," is the language of equal rights. When man is civilized enough to render to woman all her rights, to accept her logic, so far as it is sound, to encourage her to read, and to reason for herself, then there will be no more heard of Mrs. Grundy, no more heard of society scandal. When man is civilized he will have a better insight into human nature; he will know that for every pleasure he grants his wife, for every ray of sunshine he causes to flit across her path of maternal anxiety and daily cares, each investment will bring him a hundred fold in his children. He will stimulate her mentality in every available way, instead of leaving it to feed on the garbage which Mrs. Grundy and her clan have dumped by the wayside, for he will know that every idea which she absorbs or formulates will be improved upon and transmitted to her offspring to better the condition of and elevate humanity. Thus for the sake of the generations yet to be woman should have every right that man has.

Mrs. F. A. ABBOTT.

Coming!

LIBERAL, MO., June 30, 1895.

Watch for the Date! Great Roman Jerusalem Aggregation of Biblical Relics! Great Holy Show! Bring the children! Great museum and only menagerie of biblical animals! Relics rich and rare! Our museum contains the following wonders: Core of the apple Eve ate; cinder from Abel's altar; the club with which Cain slew Abel, and a photo of Cain's wife and the little Cains! Piece of Noah's ark, and the lead pencil Noah used in checking off the animals as they went into the ark! Brick from the Tower of Babel, and the spotted rods Jacob put in Laban's watering trough! Lynch pin of Pharaoh's chariot, and broomstick of the Witch of Endor! Sword on which Saul suicided! Ahab's chariot and Goliath's spear! Ram's horns that knocked down the walls of Jericho, Gideon's fleece, pitchers, and trumpets with which he defeated the Midianites! The nail with which Jael slew Sisera! We have also David's dowry to Michael, and the ark of the Lord that slew 50,000 people for looking in it! Our menagerie contains the Lamb of God, Lion of the tribe of Judah, Balaam's ass, seven lean kine and seven fat kine of Pharaoh's vision, and Elijah's fiery steeds that carried him to heaven! We have the colt J. Christ stole, the lions that did not eat Daniel, and the pale horse on which death rides! The great serpent-lion, Satan, with head of serpent, body of lion, cloven feet, and diet of sulphur and brimstone, is on exhibition in our great moral show; the great Lion-Lamb-Star-Lily-Rose, Jesus Christ, who is perpetually roaring, "I am the Rose of Sharon, the Lily of the Valley, the Bright and Morning Star, and the Lion of the Tribe of Judah!" He has lilies for hands and in the right one carries seven stars, a star-shaped head and a sharp sword coming out of his mouth, and rose-colored eyes! See the she-bears that ate forty-two children for mocking the old baldhead of Israel! The great red dragon that knocked down one-third of the stars with his tail! The beast with seven heads and ten horns seen by Daniel in his vision! The ravens that fed Elijah, and the quails that came from the Red Sea, are in our great ornithological display, with a pair of Gabriel's last year's wings! Our circus and dramatic troupe is composed of a brilliant galaxy of stars engaged especially for our great trip around the world. First is the wonderful Holy Ghost. Come and see him! We could not get G. Hovah, because he has so much to do watching the sparrows fall, and numbering the hairs of the heads of his numerous progeny, but he sent his wife to represent him. We have the poor widow and her mite; the scarlet woman of Revelation; the angel that measured heaven and his measuring reed, and Rahab the harlot! Our botanical display is unsurpassed. See the bulrushes Moses lay in; the lilies that toil not, neither do they spin; the fig-tree that did not have sense enough to bear figs out of season, because Christ wanted them. We show also the grass that to-day is and to-morrow is cast into the oven. In the reptile department we have Moses's brazen serpent, and many other wonderful curiosities direct from the Vatican. Our grand spectacular circus drama begins at 2 P.M. Program: Triumphant march of the Patriarchs; all the bloody crimes of the old Testament in living procession! The coming of the Wise Men. Joseph's Dream! The flight into Egypt! Singing of Solomon's Song! Calvary scene with real thieves and the true cross of Christ! Clown's Carnival and Festival of Fools!—T. D. Talmage, J. Cook, S. Jones, and D. L. Moody, actors. Entrance of J. Christ and apostles cutting off their right hands and plucking out their eyes on account of their offensive nature. Isle of Patmos and John's Vision; singing of 109th Psalm. Great bust-up; turning of the sun into darkness, moon into blood, and all people beholding the coming of Christ in the clouds of heaven, in spite of the roundness of the earth! Falling stars and hell to pay generally, all in charge of Talmage, Master of Pulpit Fireworks! Solomon's apes and peacocks will be seen, also David dancing before the ark of the Lord! A gold brick from the New Jerusalem, and fire-shovel from hell can be seen in our mighty collection of marvels! Refreshments will be served consisting of manna, milk, and honey; wine of the supply Christ made at Cana; part of the cake the widow of Sarepta made for Elijah, and water brought from the rock at command of Moses. See Aaron's rod that budded, and also the hickory-rod that did not bud. Great Moral Tableaux shown in our free street parade: Noah and his sons. Onan and Tamar. Lot and his daughters. David and Mrs. Uriah. Bring the children to see and hear Sam Jones, the most vulgar man in America. If you believe all we tell we give a free ticket to the New Jerusalem, but if not, we will damn you quick. Greatest vindication of Christianity ever known, and our collection of petrified fish tales is unexcelled. Street parade at 10 A.M. Band playing on golden harps, trumpets, cornets, and cymbals. Rascals and hypocrites, followed by Sunday-school children armed and uniformed for the slaughter of Infidels and heretics. Lot's pickled wife and Nebuchadnezzar's golden image follow, and then will be seen the furnace in which Wide Brick, Side Brick, and To-Bad-We-Go were thrown. Tickets admit to all at the price of common sense, decency, or individuality. Clergy admitted free. Rain or shine we show every day! Our tents are those that the Israelites dwelt in, and our circus is held in the tabernacle constructed by Moses at the command of G. Hovah. We will positively exhibit where we say we will; this show is managed by John Calvin, Martin Luther, and John Knox. The Fool Killer is turned loose after each performance, as he gets no work where our show does not travel. Lie, steal, and kill, for "the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin."

Mortuary—Alexander Risk.

PALO, IA., June 28, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: It is with sad feelings I have to record the death of our friend and comrade, Alexander Risk, of Fayette county, Iowa. He passed away on the 10th of this month, at 1:15 in the morning. He was born in Mochrum, Wigtonshire, Scotland, January 27th, 1827. He came to America in 1850, and to Iowa in 1852, and has been a business man ever since. He made considerable property, and has left his family well to do. I had some acquaintance with him, although we lived a long distance apart. My wife and I went up to see him a few weeks before he died. He said he was willing to go at any time, for he had been suffering so long with cancer in the stomach. He wished I would tell the friends that he should die as he had lived, true to the cause he loved so well. I wished to go to the funeral, but sickness prevented, so we had to say farewell.

To show the liberal disposition of the man: We had a convention in Cedar Rapids a good many years ago. E. C. Walker and Colonel Billings were there. Some one proposed to go around with the hat to get money to pay the expenses. Brother Risk said "No," he would rather pay the whole bill himself. Then we all threw in as we felt able; still there was a shortage of $14, and he stepped up and paid in the balance. Those who were there will remember the circumstance. He was always a friend in need. JOHN STRATFORD.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Scandal-Mongers.

Do you hear the scandal-mongers
Passing by,
Breathing poison in a whisper,
In a sigh?
Moving cautiously and slow,
Smiling sweetly as they go
Never noisy—gliding smoothly as a snake,
Slipping here and sliding there
Through the meadows fresh and fair,
Leaving subtle slime and poison in their wake.
Saw you not the scandal-monger
As she sat
Beaming brightly near the roses
On her hat?
In her dainty gloves and dress,
Angel-like, and nothing less,
Seemed she, casting smiles and pleasing words about.
Once she shrugged and shook her head,
Raised her eyes and nothing said
When you spoke of friends, and yet it left a doubt.
Did you watch the scandal-monger
At the ball?
Through the music, rhythm, beauty,
Light and all,
Moving here and moving there,
With a whisper light as air,
Casting shadows on a sister woman's fame—
Just a whispered word or glance—
As she floated through the dance,
And a doubt forever hangs upon a name.
You will find the scandal-mongers
Everywhere.
Sometimes men, but often women,
Young and fair;
Yet their tongues drip foulest slime,
And they spend their leisure time Casting mud on those who climb by work or worth!
Shun them, shun them as you go,
Shun them, whether high or low;
They are but the cursed serpents of the earth.

[CONCLUDED.]

Their histories were written in the book and volume of "Aunt Mary's" brain, where oft she turned the leaf to read.

Back by the fire-place were an old, very old, pair of men's boots, hard and bronzed by time. "Whose boots were those?" and "Did 'Aunt Mary' wear such boots?" were the queries freely passed.

There was a subdued silence when some one said, "They belonged to 'Aunt Mary's' only brother, who went away to sea long ago, and never returned. The boots have always remained there, just where he left them when he went away."

Trunks were emptied of old newspapers, reports ancient as the hills, almost; old books and pamphlets, and, side by side, an old copy of Baxter's "Saint's Rest" and Paine's "Age of Reason." Fox's "Book of Martyrs" was near by, but the "Age of Reason" showed it had received most attention, its leaves being worn and crumpled. Mary had kept this literature because her father had read and preserved it.

The black crape bonnet and veil that her mother wore was full of a tender and mournful pathos. It seemed to reprove the jesting crowd before whom it was held. Nobody bid for the bonnet. Was it because it had been worn at funerals, where sorrow and grief had been, or because the crape was gray and old?

There were patchwork bed-quilts held before the upturned, eager eyes of the crowd. The patches had been set in curious form, and were of many colors. How many hopes seemed to have been sewed in with each quaint square and diamond shape, hopes that faded and disappeared ere they were half realized!

A very, very old muslin gown made with a round waist and close, tight-fitting sleeves in wide contrast to the present prevailing mode, was brought forth from an old-fashioned handbox, and spread before the wide-mouthed, wondering gaze of those in the room. "Aunt Mary" wore it years and years ago, when, with red roses in her cheeks and hope in her heart, she had tripped along Spring street on her way to church or to some gala festival. What a world of romance was in its scant folds and the faded ribbon hanging so limp at the neck! Amid many fancies of old-time lovers' walks, when Aunt Mary was a sprightly girl and young men followed in her footsteps, the white muslin dress was sold to the highest bidder, a dear old friend who had known Mary when she was youthful and pretty, who had seen her arrayed in that same gown. Her aged fingers clasped the precious relic of by-gone days with love and reverence.

A deep silence, a hush like that at an open grave, fell upon the upturned faces when the auctioneer held up a child's frock of red calico, out low in the neck, with short, puffed sleeves. It was of the strong, thick, lasting quality of the imported English print of long ago. With the little gown was a pair of red morocco shoes, a string of amber beads, and a long lock of golden-brown hair. The aged woman who had purchased the muslin gown whispered softly: "They belonged to little Nelly. She died in 1834."

"I can't offer these things at auction!" ejaculated the auctioneer, while his eyes grew moist, and a tear dropped on the little red gown. Many eyes were tear-wet also, as he gently laid the dress, the amber beads, the little red shoes, and the lock of golden-brown hair on a shelf near by, high up, where nobody could reach them.

"And you wouldn't have been allowed to so much as touch them had Aunt Mary her reason," said the old lady, who had eagerly watched every movement.

For sixty years these mementos of little Nelly had been sacredly preserved by her fond and idolizing sister Mary, now shut away from the world and all that she had loved, sitting alone in mental darkness, but happy as a child. Nobody knew where little Nelly was buried, the child-sister of four years, who went away so many years ago, and whose memory had been so long and fondly cherished by at least one person in the world.

Visions of the little maiden running in and out of the old house, her hands full of buttercups and field daisies, her sweet face aglow with innocent happiness, would arise, and her childish prattle arose above the voice of the auctioneer. We seemed to see her arrayed in the little red dress, her feet in the pretty red morocco slippers, with her amber beads about her little neck. How dear she was, this little pet of the household! And what grief and sorrow filled their lonely hearts when sickness overtook her, and the dear face grew whiter than snow, when the eyes closed never again to show the love-light that death extinguished. The pattering feet and the little white hands had been still for many a year, and she was forgotten.

No, "Aunt Mary" had kept her memory clean, sweet, and fragrant. She knew the spot of green grass that covered her form, now long ago changed to mold and dust.

Hurrying feet had come and gone, joys and sorrows passed like a panorama, and now strangers had come in to handle, but not roughly, no! not roughly, but tenderly and with a sigh, the belongings of little Nelly. The little garments survived her. She had gone, but they existed still, and the tress of gold-brown hair seemed as soft and silken as if it were only yesterday it had been cut from her head.

No relative was there to take it from the fingers of the auctioneer, that trembled as he gently laid the sacred relics away.

"Aunt Mary" did not know that nature had kindly made her as a very little child. She did not remember any longer. Well for her that memory had become a blank.

HAND-BOOK OF FREETHOUGHT

By W. S. BELL.

Containing in condensed and systematized form a vast amount of evidence against the superstitious doctrines of Christianity. As a book of reference and aid to all truth seekers it is invaluable. Its classification of subjects makes it a hand-book. As Ingersoll said of Paine's "Age of Reason," it enables somebody in every village to "corner the parson." Its wide variety of subjects include all the disputed points between Christianity and Freethought.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property
in the United States.
Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?
REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.
Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the value, by denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to wealth of the leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of special interest to certain Cities, States, official figures, all comparisons being based upon official figures.
This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.
By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:
Ten copies. $1.00
Fifty copies. 4.50
One hundred copies. 8.00

400 Years OF Freethought

By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pp., Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. $5.
With The Truth Seeker for One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!
Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

The instincts of the race are renewed in each new born infant.—Elizabeth Harrison.

We want no kings but kings of toil,
No crowns but crowns of deeds—
Not royal birth, but sterling worth,
Must mark the man who leads.
—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

WHEN there is fully recognized the truth that moral beauty is higher than intellectual power—when the wish to be admired is in large measure replaced by the wish to be loved—that strife for distinction which the present phase of civilization shows us will be greatly moderated.—Herbert Spencer.

FROM man to molecule, creation is the creature of law. In the life-and-death struggle now raging between sacerdotalism and science—between darkness and light—who can doubt the issue? Who can doubt which is "fittest to survive," which, really, conforms to the drift of evolution?—H. C. Hiller.

IN France, the people were the sport of a king's caprice. Everywhere was the shadow of the Bastille. It fell upon the sunniest field, upon the happiest home. With the king walked the headsman; back of the throne was the chamber of torture. The church appealed to the rack, and Faith relied on the fagot. Science was an outcast, and Philosophy, so-called, was the pander of superstition. Nobles and priests were sacred. Peasants were vermin. Idleness sat at the banquet, and Industry gathered the crumbs and crusts.—Ingersoll.

CALUMNY is the homage which dogmatism has ever paid to conscience. Even in the periods when the guilt of heresy was universally believed, the spirit of intolerance was only sustained by the diffusion of countless libels against the misbeliever, and by the systematic concealment of his virtues. How sedulously theologians at that time labored in this task, how unscrupulously they maligned and blackened every leading opponent of their views, how eagerly they fanned the flame of sectarian animosity, how uniformly they prohibited those whom they could influence from studying the writings or frequenting the society of men of different opinions from their own, is well known to all who are acquainted with ecclesiastical history.—W. E. H. Lecky.

THE American Protective Association is provincial, and therefore, to any lofty intuitions, immoral and a menace. It violates the canons of equal freedom, and does it as such violations usually do, in behalf of lower interests and narrow ideals. Liberty is as precious to one who does not believe in liberty as to one who does. I would yield and defend all liberties except the liberty to abbreviate and violate liberty. And I would defend Catholics in all just claims as readily as I would defend myself. The fact that the Catholic church concerns itself little to grant liberty, and the suspicion that it would violate my autonomy if it had the chance, does not drive me from my conviction. All public and private action which offends against the principle of solidarity is bad. The American Protective Association is birthed in such offense and is therefore discredited and an aggression.—Horace L. Traubel.

THERE is no such unity as nature with which man can in any intelligible manner be compared. Man and his productions are no more outside of, or in opposition to, nature than are bees and birds and their productions. In the widest sense of the word, nature is the totality of objects perceived as the world. To ascribe intelligent unity or concerted action to this totality is the acme of personifying absurdity. In another and narrower sense of the word, every object in nature has a nature of its own. In this sense everything must, and does, act according to its nature; for we know its nature only by its acts, and, consequently, to say it acts contrary to its nature would be to say it acts contrary to its acts. To say that man resists or surpasses nature is only an absurd play on words, for the resistance is as natural as the thing resisted, and the thing which surpasses as the thing surpassed. Man is as truly the sport of natural forces as a stone, for the simple reason that there are no unnatural forces. He is free when he is free to act according to his inclinations. Any higher degree of freedom than this cannot be sought or conceived by any man.—J. H. Beatty, in Agnostic Journal

EPIDEMIC DELUSIONS. A Lecture by Frederic R. Marvin, M.D. Giving reasonable reasons for Religious and other Delusions.

FALSE CLAIMS OF THE CHURCH. John E. Remsburg's most noted work, and one of the most effective ever written by any Freethinker.

FIRST EPISTLE OF BENNETT THE APOSTLE TO THE TRUTH SEEKERS. Written while journeying in and near the land of Yahweh. Containing the best moral instructions of the world from the great teachers of the former ages. D. M. Bennett.

THE GIANT DELUSION. A paper read before the Freethought International Congress at Chicago. One of Otto Wettstein's fraternal attacks on Spiritualism.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY. To which is added a poem on Thomas Paine. One of Samuel P. Putnam's most brilliant lectures. Every Christian who asks the idiotic question, "What Has Infidelity Done?" should be induced to read this book, if he has to be paid to do it.

HOW CAN WE BE SAVED? Was Jesus Supernaturally Conceived, and did he Rise from the Dead? Israel W. Groh.

INGERSOLL AND JESUS. Showing how the two agree. A poem by Samuel P. Putnam.

THE LIMITATIONS OF TOLERATION. A discussion between Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic R. Coudert, Ex-Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, before the Nineteenth Century Club of New York. "Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him." Colonel Ingersoll maintains this, the others deny it. Mr. Coudert is a Roman Catholic, Mr. Woodford a Protestant.

MATERIALISM: Its History, and Its Influence Upon Society. Dr. Louis Buchner.

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE WORKERS. A Consideration of the Marvels and Miracles of the New Testament. One of John Peck's best books.

MOSES BEFORE THE COURT, or The Forgery of the Old Testament. Dedicated to the Clergy. H. J. Seignuret, M.D.

THE NEW GOD. "It is an open secret that man has always made his Gods. They exist in and through him, as the image exists in and through the mirror. Take away man and you take away God—the image vanishes." This pamphlet, therefore, is a consideration of what kind of a God man should make. Samuel P. Putnam.

ORTHODOXY. A lecture by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and one of that great man's best. The subjects considered are: Orthodox Religion Dying Out, Religious Deaths and Births, The Religion of Reciprocity, Mohammed, The Destruction of Art, The Discovery of America, Copernicus and Kepler, Charles Darwin, Special Providence, The Latest Creed, God as a Governor, The Love of God, The Fall of Man, The Atonement, The Second Birth, Inspiration, The Reign of Truth and Love, The Wars It Brought, The Resurrection, The Judgment-Day, Pious Evasions, "No Bible, No Civilization," Miracles of the New Testament, The Ascension, Casting out Devils, Necessity of Belief, Eternal Punishment, Some who Are Damned, What I Believe, Immortality. This lecture is on the famous text, "The Clergy know that I know that they do not know."

PERSONAL EXISTENCE AFTER DEATH IMPROBABLE. L. R. Smith.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS MASS MEETING AT LINCOLN HALL, WASHINGTON. Being the Speeches of Hon. FREDERICK DOUGLASS and Col. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL on the Decision of the United States Court that the Civil Rights Act is Unconstitutional. Fifty-three large octavo pages, of which Colonel Ingersoll's speech occupies 28 pages.

PULPIT, PEW, AND CRADLE. So long as the Pulpit speaks to believing Pews composed chiefly of mothers, the cradle will be rocked by ghosts and the race will remain on its knees to a devil of its own creation and to a God who is powerless against him. One of Helen Gardner's brightest efforts.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY BETTER THAN ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. M. Babcock.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS. One of L. K. Washburn's best lectures, and it is, like all of his, very good.

THE ROARING LION ON THE TRACK. One of M. Babcock's comical sermons.

SCIENCE vs. RELIGION, or The Conflict Between Reason and Superstition. T. C. Widdcombe.

ST. MATTHEW BEFORE THE COURT. Presenting the evidence of the forgery of his alleged gospel. H. J. Seignuret.

SISTER LUCY AND HER AWFUL DISCLOSURES REGARDING NEW HALL CONVENT. Showing that Convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom.

SPIRITUALISM FROM A MATERIALISTIC STANDPOINT. B. F. Underwood. Written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK. Torture Implements Employed in the 15th and 16th centuries for the promulgation of Christianity. Being the Nuremberg Collection, with specimens from the Holy Inquisition. 23 pictures. The descriptions and reflections by George E. Macdonald.

VICTOR HUGO'S ORATION ON VOLTAIRE, delivered on the one hundredth anniversary of Voltaire's death. Translated by James Parton, author of the Life of Voltaire. To which are added the three great poems of Goethe, George Eliot, and Longfellow.

WAS CHRIST CRUCIFIED? Austin Bierbower. A lawyer's consideration of the evidence of that alleged event.

WAS JESUS INSANE? A consideration of Christ's alleged acts which would lead one to that conclusion. L. K. Washburn.

WHY DON'T HE LEND A HAND? And other Agnostic Poems. Samuel P. Putnam. The title poem is perhaps the most popular of Mr. Putnam's many poems, and a great many editions of it have been called for. The other poems are: "The Golden Age, The Ideal and the Real, Not Dead, but Living, Fruition, Hope, Thomas Paine, Nature's Gospel, Address to Deity, and the short poems so often recited with great effect by Charles Watts, Give Us Light."

WILL THE COMING MAN WORSHIP GOD? B. F. Underwood; written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

WOMAN: FOUR CENTURIES OF PROGRESS. A lecture delivered at the Freethinkers' International Congress at Chicago. Considering: The Cause of Woman's Subjugation, The Canon Law and Its Effects Upon Her, Theology Never Helpful to Woman, Invention Woman's Friend, Freethought the Benefactor of Woman. Susan H. Wixon.

WOMAN: HER PAST AND PRESENT, HER RIGHTS AND WRONGS. A lecture delivered before the Woman Suffrage Association of Denver, Col., by B. F. Underwood.

Containing the famous Christmas Sermon by Colonel Ingersoll, the protests thereby evoked from the ministers who think they own this country and all therein, and Colonel Ingersoll's replies to the same. A finely gotten up pamphlet. Price, 25 cents.

Liberty for Man,

Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

LINCOLN

This is Colonel INGERSOLL's great lecture, printed in a handsome pamphlet, and containing the Century's famous portrait of Lincoln—said to be the best extant. Price, 25 cents.

SHAKSPERE

"An intellectual ocean, whose waves touched all the shores of thought." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with likeness of Shakspeare from the Kesselstadt death mask. Price, 25 cents.

Not for Parsons.

I SEE that a New York church has just got the pet clergyman of a sister church in a small town by throwing off the limit and raising the small church out. It couldn't see $10,000 a year, and so had to throw up its hands. And, by the way, what sort of preacher would St. Paul have been if he had been paid ten thousand a year to show people of "wealth and refinement" how to reach the carriage entrance of the New Jerusalem?—New York World.

THE Elmira Advertiser tells a story of a clergyman about to leave his parish who had endeared himself to every one in it by his self denying pastoral work. Among those who called upon him to say good-by were an aged couple who were particularly fond of him. When they were about to leave, the old lady, with much feeling and many tears, while grasping the pastor by the hand (who was moved to tears himself), said, "The Lord only knows, Brother S., how often I've bitten my fingers that I might keep awake to hear your good sermons." The moral of the story appears to be that fine preaching is not the only necessary qualification of a clergyman.

THE following is an amusing instance of the tenacity with which the Highlanders hold to the honors and antiquity of their kindred. A dispute arose between Campbell and McLean upon the never-ending subject. McLean would not allow that the Campbells had any right to rank with the McLeans in antiquity, who, he insisted, were in existence as a clan from the beginning of the world. Campbell had a little more biblical lore than his antagonist, and asked him if the clan McLean lived before the flood. "Flood! What flood?" said McLean. "The flood that you know drowned all the world but Noah and his family and his flocks," said Campbell. "Pooh! you and your flood," said McLean; "my clan was before the flood." "I have not read in my Bible," observed Campbell, "of the name of McLean going into Noah's ark." "Noah's ark," retorted McLean in contempt, "who ever heard of a McLean that had not a boat of his own!"—Household Words.

FIVE cents was the value which a Texas farmer once placed upon a minister's prayer. The story is told in the Epworth Era of the Rev. H. S. Thrall, one of the pioneers of Methodism in Texas. In company with a number of itinerants, who were on their way to conference, Doctor Thrall stopped to spend the night with an old farmer. It was the custom then to settle the bill at night, so that they might rise about three o'clock in the morning and ride a good way before breakfast, and lie by in the heat of the day. Doctor Thrall, acting as spokesman of the party, said to the old farmer after supper, "We are a company of Methodist preachers going to conference. If you will get the family together we will have prayers with you." After prayers, one by one settled his bill. Doctor Thrall's turn came, and he asked for his bill. The old farmer replied: "Well, pa'son, I charged the rest twenty-five cents, but bein' as you prayed for us so good, I won't charge you but twenty cents."

A SERMON I HEARD ON TOGG'S ISLAND
BY THE REV. MR. LITERAL.

Brethren and Sisters: I take for my text, on this beautiful Sunday morning, a few verses from the last chapter of Mark—"Go ye into the world and preach the gospel to every creature." And they that believe shall cast out devils . . . and do many wonderful works. And these signs shall follow them that believe: . . . They shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them."

Now, brethren and sisters, let us show our belief by doing these things. You, sister Jones, will please take a respectable dose of strychnine upon your arrival home; you, brother Smith, will at once go to the gardens and take therefrom a poisonous snake, wrap it twice around thy neck and behold it shall not harm thee. Brother Brown will jump into the middle of the river on his way home and refuse all aid except that which shall be sent him by the Holy Ghost.

(Consequence: Three funerals, but only two corpses appeared. Although they dragged the river for three days, nothing was ever found of brother Brown except his hat. The Rev. Mr. Literal suggested that he was probably taken up into heaven by a whirlwind).

"Pray without ceasing." "Whatsoever ye ask ye shall receive." You, brother Rouse, have a crop of corn now parched and dying for lack of rain. Our brother Jenkins has a large quantity of hay in the field and it needs dry weather for a week or it will be ruined. Brother Rouse, you will pray for rain. Brother Jenkins, you will pray for dry weather, and behold both your prayers shall be answered. Arise and let us sing—"Oh To Be Nothing." Amen. BEN ELLIS.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

A small farm of 10 acres 86 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water, good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes' walk of the railroad station, 9 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes' walk.

The place is specially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1,000 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest, overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

IN 1878 the state church cost France 53,643,995 francs; this year, 45,412,653 francs. Ours costs more than the largest of these sums through the exemption of ecclesiastical property from taxation.

GLADSTONE sends this message to the Liberal constituencies of London: "Above all other purposes, vindicate the rights of the House of Commons as the organ of the nation, and establish the honor of England, as well as consolidate the strength of the empire, by conceding the just constitutional claims of Ireland."

AFTER a confinement in jail for a period of two months, Herman Teistler, editor and proprietor of the German Freethought paper Lichtstrahlen, was sentenced to 1½ years' imprisonment, and Otto Havnish 1 years' imprisonment and 60 marks fine.

THE Holy See has directed that the decree prohibiting Catholics from belonging to the Knights of Pythias, the Odd Fellows, or the Sons of Temperance, shall be promulgated and enforced in every diocese throughout the country. The decree is mandatory.

FUGITIVE Chinese soldiers from Formosa, who sought refuge on a transport flying the German flag, were fired on by their fellow-soldiers in the forts at Tamsui and hundreds were killed in the boats and on the transport. The German gunboat Ilitis silenced the forts in five minutes.

THE entire eastern watershed of the Rocky Mountains, from the Nebraska and Iowa line to Texas, was swept by the late storm of wind and rain. Fifty lives are known to have been lost and many other persons are missing. The property loss reaches into the millions of dollars.

THE Cuban revolutionists have selected Thomas Estrada Palma, of Central Valley, N. Y., as civil representative in place of Jose Marti, assassinated by a spy in Cuba. "The Territories in Revolution," as Cuba itself is designated, will elect a president and cabinet officers in about a month.

It seems to be possible that political party lines in Canada will be religious lines, Catholics on one side and Protestants on the other. It grows out of the refusal of the Dominion government to concur with the views of the province of Manitoba on the question of separate Catholic schools.

UNITED STATES SENATOR BLACKBURN was taken off the platform in Kentucky by the state committee of his party because he would not abide by the anti-free silver policy of the party in that state. He refuses to obey the committee, saying that he will talk for free silver wherever he speaks.

As a result of the Sunday closing crusade in this city Ollie Teall has organized and had incorporated the Girder Club, which will have branches in all parts of New York. Its object is to promote social intercourse and to dispense supplies of all kinds. Fifty men or women who join the Girder Club may have a club house in their immediate neighborhood.

THE sudden police crusade against street fruit stands in New York has, according to the calculations of the Journal of Commerce, thrown 11,000 men out of employment and in the first six days enforcement of the new rule cost the wholesale fruit dealers $100,000. Who can correctly estimate the numbers of the 11,000 who have thus been driven into beggary or crime?

EX-SECRETARY FOSTER, who acted as counsel for China in the peace negotiations with Japan, gives it as his opinion that the amicable relations of the two countries will not soon again seriously be disturbed, and that China will have no difficulty in paying the war indemnity, half of which has already been secured. The other payments extend over a period of six years.

ON July 9th the Grand Trunk railroad ran two trains loaded with Catholic pilgrims from Vermont to the shrine of St. Anne of Beaupre in Canada. At Craig's Road, thirty miles west of Quebec, the second train smashed into the rear of the first and thirteen persons were killed, a large number fatally hurt, and many others seriously injured. Among the killed were three priests.

AT the bye election in Derby in 1892 Sir William Harcourt had 4,000 majority. On July 13th inst. he was defeated by 1,700 majority. The change was largely caused by his Local Veto bill, aimed at the liquor traffic. It is evident that this bill has had a similar influence in other districts, and it now seems certain that it will result in indefinitely postponing the reforms championed by the Liberal party. A like crusade in this city is likely to restore Tammany to power.

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

Writes very letter in sight of operator. Does most of the work in writing AUTOMATICALLY, and yields in the time thus saved additional work.

It acts as if it studied the convenience of the operator at every turn, and thereby lightens his labor and renders him capable of doing more.

It has a knack of keeping well, and is always ready at critical or other times.

These are some of the reasons why it is different from all other writing machines.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

A Journal of Freethought and Reform.

Vol. 22, No. 30. { PUBLISHED WEEKLY. } New York, Saturday, July 27, 1895. { 28 LAFAYETTE PL. } $3.00 Per Year.

A GRIM OBJECTOR TO SHRINE-WORSHIP. (The Pilgrims who met death on their way to the shrine of Ste. Anne de Beaupré.)

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing the Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

What a New Subscriber, Who Has Received His Pictorial Text-Book, Says of It.

LAMAR, Mo., May 8, 1895.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is received, and after a careful examination of the work I unhesitatingly pronounce it one of the most impressive Freethought works ever issued from the press. It will indeed "corner the parson" and all his flock, and I shall take great pleasure in showing the book to my orthodox friends. As a reference book it is invaluable, and it should find a place in every Freethinker's library.

Respectfully, W. F. BAILEY.

When Renewing Your Subscription, Take Advantage of These Good Offers.

For $6.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and S. P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" ($5). Large Octavo, 1150 pages, gilt sides and back, marbled edges—the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press. 140 Half Tone Engravings of the Prominent Freethinkers of the past four centuries.

The object of this work is to present the Course of Freethought throughout the Civilized World from the time of Columbus and Bruno to the time of Ingersoll. It is a radical Historic Record of the greatest developments of the human race. It reveals Freethought as an intellectual, moral, literary, social, industrial, and political movement. It shows what Freethought is in itself, how manifold are its influences, and with what promise we can hail its future triumph. "FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT" embraces the most illustrious pages of human history, adorned with the brightest genius, radiant with the most splendid poetry, rich with the greatest inventions and discoveries, and ennobled with freedom's most shining advance. Nothing can be more interesting or more inspiring to the pioneer workers of to-day, to those who are still in the van for human rights and progress. No Liberal can afford to be without this book. It contains the greatest thoughts and the greatest deeds of the greatest men in one harmonious and magnificent whole, a vivid picture of man's sublimest evolution, with the added glory of woman's emancipation from the chains and slavery of a barbaric church.

Darwin and After Darwin

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the Church so often refers: "Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. God's "Tender Mercies" Illustrated.

... "It is not that they [Agnostics] wish to do this, but that they must; self-deception is the alternative. There is no pleasure in the consciousness of being an infinitesimal bubble on a globe that is itself infinitesimal compared with the totality of things.

"Those on whom the un pitying rush of changes inflicts sufferings which are often without remedy, find no consolation in the thought that they are at the mercy of forces which cause, indifferently, now the destruction of a sun, and now the death of an animalcule. Contemplation of a universe which is without conceivable beginning or imaginable end, and without intelligible purpose, yields no satisfaction. The desire to know what it all means is no less strong in the Agnostic than in others [religionists], and raises sympathy with them. Failing utterly to find any interpretation himself, he feels a regretful inability to accept the interpretation they offer."—Herbert Spencer.

Not long ago some two hundred Catholic pilgrims were killed by a railroad accident in Mexico while returning from a shrine in the mountains. On July 9th there was a similar disaster at Craigs Road, near Quebec, Canada. A train in two sections, on the Grand Trunk line, was carrying pilgrims to the shrine of Ste. Anne de Beaupré. The first section was loaded with passengers taken on at Richmond, while on the second had come the pilgrims from Sherbrooke, Windsor Mills, and other points in Vermont. The first section stopped at Craigs Road to permit a freight to switch, and sent out men to signal the second section, twenty minutes behind. The semaphore was thrown to "Danger," and all seemed safe. The rear car of the first section was a Pullman sleeper, in which were the priests and others having the excursion in charge. It is supposed that Engineer McLeod of the second section must have been dozing, and so failed to see the warning semaphore as he rushed onward in the gloom of the early morning. His engine imbedded itself in the Pullman, and the latter was forced forward, partially telescoping the car immediately ahead. Some of the occupants of the palace car were killed as they slept, and others awoke to find themselves mangled and bleeding. Most of the loss of life occurred in this car occupied by the priests and other leaders. Thirteen persons in all were killed outright, and fifty or more injured, many fatally. The disaster was terrible, heartrending. The scene in the hospital at Levis, after the wounded had been brought in, was one that no eye-witness could ever forget, says a writer who was there. "The cries of some of the victims were fearful to hear." Of course the first inquiry set on foot was to discover, if possible, who was responsible for the catastrophe. Had the excursionists been Infidels, the Christians would at once have charged the crime to God. They would have said that he had sent the disaster as a "judgment" upon the ungodly. We suppose that even as it is, the theocrats of Pennsylvania will solemnly asseverate that it is heaven's warning to us for our national disregard of the Sabbath. They have already distinctly said that all our recent troubles—drouths, freshets, forest fires, monetary panics, cyclones, and the rest—are traceable to this cause. This is logical, from their point of view and from the point of view of Theists generally; for if God "doeth all things well," then there must be some good concealed in such awful massacres as that in Mexico and the later one at Craigs Road. But if God really did this, and for a wise purpose, as the consistent Christian is bound to believe, why hunt for the human agent for the purpose of holding him responsible at the bar of human justice? He acted as God compelled him to act, and there is neither sense nor equity in punishing him for doing that which God "from the beginning" had ordained that he should do. No possible precaution on the part of Engineer McLeod could have prevented the mangling of these priests and other devoted Christians, for that which God knows is to be will be, and what logical Theist will venture to say that the infinit god in whom he believes did not know, down to the minutest particular, what would occur at Craigs Road, Canada, in the dull gray of the morning of July 9, 1895?

The "Outlook" Reasons Badly.

"The same objections to prayer for divine interference with the order of things external to ourselves apply with equal force to prayer for the modification of our own characters. 'Make me a clean heart, O God,' is as naked an appeal for miraculous interference as a prayer for rain. Each alike, if granted, would be a disturbance of natural causation, seeing that human character, no less than the weather, is a product of natural causes."—Norman Pearson, in the Nineteenth Century.

This appears to be sound reasoning. In so far as the prayer of the devotee affects his own actions or the actions of those who hear it there is nothing miraculous in the effect produced, that is, there is no contravention of natural law. For the devotee himself the prayer is the effect of his desire to lead a better life, and is simply a wish expressed to a power that he imagines has the desire and the ability to do for him what he thinks he cannot do for himself. In other words, the prayer, in so far as it relates to the suppliant himself, is an effect, not a cause. It may, certainly, in some instances, become a cause, as when the individual who has prayed aloud before his fellows for a "clean heart" is impelled by his pride or other emotions to endeavor to convince those who heard him that he was sincere in his expressed desire to do better than he had done previously. The prayer may be also the cause of altered courses of action on the part of the auditors, who are influenced by it as they would be by an exhortation, a condemnation, an argument, or a demonstration. Character being the product and the expression of natural forces, there is nothing supernatural in the effects that prayer thus produces on the one who prays and on those who hear him. But what we have quoted from the article of Mr. Pearson the Outlook calls a "curious paragraph," and proceeds to criticize it in these words:

"On no subject except theology would a reputable thinker offer, or a reputable review publish, such a paragraph as this; but in arguing on theology all the ordinary rules of reason seem to be abolished by a certain class of writers, both orthodox and heretical. Mr. Pearson's argument in this paragraph would be as efficacious to prove that communication between man and man is impossible as to prove that communication is impossible between man and God. If it is not possible for the divine spirit to exercise a purifying, elevating, and enlightening influence on human experience without a disturbance of natural causation, neither is it possible for one human spirit to exercise such influence on another human spirit. If Mr. Pearson's argument is sound, children should cease to expect benign influence from their parents, pupils should cease to go to school for instruction, clients should cease to apply to lawyers for counsel, patients should cease to ask doctors for advice, and friends should cease to seek help from friends in time of trouble."

It is a risky venture to try to establish a proposition by an analogy, but the Outlook depends upon analogies alone to controvert the affirmation of Mr. Pearson and prove that God answers prayer. The child and the parent, the pupil and the teacher, the client and the attorney, the patient and the physician, the friend and the friend, are all known to exist. That there is, in each instance, an effect produced by the relation of the two terms or causes, we know, but we are never forced to presuppose the effect in order to find one of the terms. The common experience of mankind convinces us that the parent can greatly influence the child, that the pupil can receive instruction from the teacher, that the lawyer will sometimes give the client good advice, that the physician often knows more about the physical ailments of the patient than the patient himself does, and that an intelligent and sincere friend is of great help in time of trouble. But there is no analogy between any one of these couplets and the couplet man and God. The term god has to be assumed in order to assume the effect called answered prayer. That is, we have two assumptions, one resting on the other. In the case of the lawyer and the client, the two terms are known and it is easy to demonstrate that each has an effect upon the other. In the case of God and man only one term or cause is known; the other term and the effect are unknown, and no mathematician has lived who, knowing only one term, could find the other term and the ratio. The patient asks the physician questions, and the physician gives the patient advice, which has a good or bad effect upon the patient. Both the causes are known, and the effects flow naturally from the causes. The sick man prays to the "heavenly physician," and at the same time employs the doctor and the nurse. He gets well, and says that his prayer was answered. We do not know that the prayer-answerer exists, but we do know that the doctor and the nurse exist, and the laws of logic forbid us to assume a cause when we have at hand a cause sufficient to produce the effect. If it be said that the recovery of the man is proof that the God exists, we reply that we are not logically justified in assuming that a given phenomenon demonstrates the existence of an otherwise unknown cause, while we have recourse to known causes amply adequate to account for the phenomenon, said causes being known by evidences not dependent upon our cognition of the phenomenon of which we are speaking.

The Outlook, as a supporter of Theism, is committed to the position that God is an extra-natural force, and hence it should at once see the futility of attempting to prove that he regenerates character in answer to prayer, by using the analogical method of demonstration, comparing the action of one known, natural, human force upon another known, natural, human force to the alleged action of an unknown, extra-human, extra-natural force upon a known, natural, human force. The forces in the latter couplet are unlike and therefore cannot be legitimately compared to two like forces.

Why Try to Betog the Issue?

The Independent is indignant because it is charged that "blue laws" are being enforced in this city. It says that there were never any such laws as "blue laws" in Connecticut, and, we presume it means to say, in other parts of New England. It says that Peters manufactured the "blue laws" he incorporated in his book. True, but the truth is not all in this statement, and something of what is omitted we have at least twice before in a little more than a year printed in these columns, but as it requires "line upon line" we reproduce some of it again. Alice Morse Earle, in her "Sabbath in Puritan New England," says of the laws ascribed to Rev. Mr. Peters:

"Though these laws were worded by Dr. Peters, and though we are disgusted to hear them so often quoted as historical facts, still we must acknowledge that though in detail not correct, they are in spirit true records of the old Puritan laws, which were enacted to enforce the strict and decorous observance of the Sabbath, and which were valid not only in Connecticut and Massachusetts, but in other New England states. Even a careless glance at the historical record of any old town or church will give plenty of details to prove this."

And then from page 246 to 258, inclusiv, Miss Earle gives a large number of these details. At least one man was set in the stocks for kissing his wife on Sunday as he came home after an absence of three years at sea; in Connecticut men were often fined for non-attendance at church, and by the code of laws of New Haven a Sabbath-breaker might be punished with death even. These are simply samples of the actual laws and their methods of enforcement in the early New England colonies. Perhaps, however, the Independent can see nothing "blue" in them. It may be a case of color blindness.

The Independent tries very hard to make it appear that "rum" is the only victim of the "blue" laws of New York and that all the "railing" is directed against the enforcement of the excise law. The Independent fails to admit to its readers—does it suppose that they do not read the dailies?—that the delicatessen stores are compelled to close at 10 A.M.; that the statute forbids the sale of everything but drugs, surgical appliances, confectionery, daily papers, and meals after 10 o'clock; that under the law it is just as unlawful to sell railway tickets, magazines, lemonade, nuts, shoes, neckties, and clothes as it is to sell whisky or beer. If the law was impartially enforced a copy of the Independent could not be bought at a news stand on Sunday. We are told that there "is no curtailment of personal liberty." Who wrote that? If a housewife wishes to buy a loaf of bread at 5 P.M., and cannot—and she cannot—because the law makes it a misdemeanor to sell it, is there not a curtailment of the personal liberty of both the tradesman and the housewife? But why waste breath in disproving a self-evident falsehood? However, it should be pointed out that if "there is no curtailment of personal liberty," then the law is a total failure, for the sole object of any sumptuary or Sabbath law is the curtailment of personal liberty. All such laws exist for the one purpose, primarily, of restraining people from buying and selling when they wish to buy and sell, or from engaging in work or recreation when they wish to engage in work or recreation. If that is not the curtailment of personal liberty, what in the name of reason is it?

The Independent says that these laws are not new laws. The barber shop closing law is a new law. We are also told that the barber may work until one in the afternoon. Only in this city and Saratoga; elsewhere in the state it is an offense to be shaved on Sunday at any hour. These laws are "not radical laws"? They are radically wrong; there is no need of them, no excuse for them. They are "not unreasonable laws"? No good reason can be given for their continuance; they are in denial of citizen rights, they are productive of corruption and oppression; they are provocative of neighborhood quarrels and bitter animosities. "If amusements, or music, or billiards are cut off, it is only as they are connected with the saloons." Why, then, are not the musicians, the delight of the poorer quarters of the city, permitted to play on Sunday? Why are the merry-go-rounds at Fort George Park, where hitherto so many of the children of the people of the lower part of the city have found enjoyment, motionless under the régime of our model Police commissioners? Why, on Saturday, July 21st, did the police raid the Chinese theater at 3 and 5 Doyers street, and arrest nine of the actors for violation of the Sunday law? And so on to the end of the list of the Independent's misleading, half true, or wholly untrue statements.

We were aware that Rev. Father Phelan accused the Christian Endeavorers of being somewhat fast, but we did not know until they met in Boston just how swift they were. Now we know. Rev. Dr. Martin D. Kneeland, one of the two leading Sabbatharians and theocrats of the city, in delivering his welcoming speech at their convention, said that the Christian Endeavorer was "God's high-g geared bicycle." This may account for the pace some of them strike. But is not the reverend gentleman slightly undignified, to put it mildly?

Rev. Dr. Rylance, of St. Mark's Episcopal church, writes the World that "our rural legislators who gather at Albany are very imperfectly qualified" to legislate for the "conditions and claims of our cosmopolitan population," and that the clergy should cease to confound the "Lord's Day" with the Mosiac Sabbath. It is so very rarely that an orthodox clergyman shows common sense when dealing with the question of Sunday work and amusements that we are disposed to give Dr. Rylance the fullest possible credit for his utterances and his labors in favor of a freer Sunday.

"How quick there would be war among the birds if the owls and pelicans should insist that the robins and blue jays should behave as they did."—Ram's Horn.

We are afraid that the pious and force-moralist Ram's Horn did not see all that was potential in its happy hit. Rearranging the characters in its bird society, we must point out that the chief cause of the "war" now prevailing is the impudent attempts of the Sabbatharian owls and the paternalistic jays to compel all the other denizens of the United States aviary to behave as said owls and jays say they should.

A few days ago a tornado swept out from the northwest over Cherry Hill, New Jersey, destroying most of the houses in the village, killing five persons, and injuring nearly a hundred. The Tribune says:

"It all took place within the space of ten minutes, at the end of which the sun was once more shining on the scene of ruin and desolation, as if in mockery."

Of course, this is a figure of speech, but if there is an omnipotent God, he has looked out over the world uncounted millions of times and smiled in mockery of the wounds and death caused by the storms and convulsions he had let loose.

The citizens and summer residents of Atlantic City, N. J., will have a treat on August 4th in a lecture by Colonel Ingersoll, who will tell them more about the Bible than most of them ever heard before. From Atlantic City the Colonel will go to the Spiritualists' meeting at Queen City Park, Burlington, Vt., where he will speak on four successive days, August 8, 9, 10, and 11. August 16, 17, 18, he will be at Lake Pleasant, near Greenfield, Mass. September 5th Mr. Ingersoll will attend the reunion of his old regiment, the one he raised and of which he was the colonel, the Eleventh Illinois Cavalry. It will be the first of its reunions he has attended, and his old comrades are preparing to raise the roof off the state in celebrating the meeting with their colonel. It will be a large occasion. Residents of the neighboring states who hear a great noise about that time need not necessarily think that the end of the world has come. The noise will be only the regiment and its friends cheering Mr. Ingersoll. On October 6th at the Boston theater, Boston, Mass., the colonel will begin his fall and winter campaign of civilizing the Christians of the country. For this purpose he is preparing a new lecture. Every one but the ministers and a few bigots will be glad to know that Mr. Ingersoll will again be very active in the lecture field as soon as cool weather comes to stay. Casual readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER would better subscribe so as to be apprised of his movements, or otherwise they might miss a chance to hear him.

The papers state that Elizabeth Cady Stanton says that when she is called upon to pray she begins her petition with, "Our Father and Mother who art in heaven." A "father in heaven" might permit the suffering that curses the world of animated existence, but we would never have supposed that a decent "mother in heaven" would be particeps criminis in the atrocities of the universe. We do not see that matters are improved any by doubling the number of tyrants. Anyway, what use does a woman of Mrs. Stanton's Freethinking tendencies have for prayer, whether to a uni-sexual or a bi-sexual heavenly police commission?

Father Enright recently delivered an address to a large audience in Kansas City, and in the Kansas City World's report of what he said we find this:

"What right have those who are not Catholics, who merely believe in the Bible, to keep Sunday holy? The Bible says that the seventh day shall be a day of rest, and Sunday is not the seventh day, but the first. Sunday is the holy day of the Catholic church, and every time it recurs, the entire civilized world renounces the teaching of the Bible and obeys the mandates of the Catholic church alone."

Amid all the storms and tribulations of our fight for liberty we can afford to stop long enough to hugely enjoy seeing this unwelcome truth "rubbed in," in so summary and thorough a fashion, on the Protestant traitors to freedom.

The New York World reminds the police commissioners that, while it is the duty of officials to enforce laws, the laws that they should be most anxious to enforce are those which have to do with offenses against property, person, and life. These are the important laws; sumptuary and Puritanical statutes can await their turn. If all the energies of the police are devoted to the watching and catching of Sabbath-breakers there is a fair presumption that the ordinary criminal is having a very good time. Every-day events in this city amply support the assumption. Murderers go undetected, burglars swarm in the residence districts, notorious criminals walk out of a city prison and are seen no more, and the professional incendiary laughs in his sleeve; and all this while some thousands of policemen are watching the side doors of saloons and chasing barbers and delicatessen men.

The very pious T. De Witt Talmage has been breaking the hearts of his clerical brethren in Iowa. He lectured at Mason City on Sunday, June thirtieth. In announcing the event previously, it was stated that the railroads would run excursion trains. This proposed "desecration of the Sabbath" was too much for the equanimity of the local clergy, and on the preceding Sunday they proceeded to scarify their more popular brother in the Lord. Of course Talmage deserved all the abuse he got, for he poses as a great stickler for the Sabbath, and his conduct was that of a hypocrite, but it is to be presumed that none of his critics have sufficient drawing power to make excursions necessary on any day. The Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad pulled ninety-nine coaches to the resort and the crowd was estimated at 12,000. The Mason City preachers did not say much about the matter that day, and Talmage wholly ignored their former criticisms. But how they would have all fulminated if the excursion had been run to a state fair or a ball game!

If the friends of liberty could only think straight and talk straight, all of them, it would not be so desperately hard to make an impression on the indifferent masses and the sincere opposition. The executive committee of the German-American Reform Union of this city got together the other day and adopted some resolutions. Among other unwise and untrue statements is this: "The object of the Sunday law is the maintenance of order and decency on Sundays." Nonsense. The preservation of order and decency on Sundays does not call for any special legislation for that day. The laws that are found sufficient for this purpose on the other days of the week are amply sufficient for Sunday. The object of the Sunday law is the preservation of the priestly monopoly of that day. The object of the Sunday law is the prevention of all work or amusements not sanctioned and desired by the churches. The object of the Sunday law is to compel the citizen who does not want to go to church to refrain from going anywhere else. This is the short and simple truth about the Sunday law, and the executive committee of the German-American Reform Union knows it; why it fails to tell what it knows we can only guess.

Our professional humorists are nowhere beside the funny men of the religious press. Here is a tickler from the Catholic Review:

"Prof. Thomas H. Huxley, the noted scientist, died at his home in Eastbourne, England, on June 29th. He is no longer an Agnostic—he knows now that the Christian revelation is true and that the Catholic church is the kingdom of God on earth. But that knowledge may have come too late to profit him."

Even if we should admit that Professor Huxley may have added thus wonderfully to his stores of knowledge, we should still be compelled to doubt that the editor of the Catholic Review knows anything more about the matter than we do. Mr. Huxley, while living, was unable to discover any proof that the Bible is a divine revelation, or that "the Catholic church is the kingdom of God on earth," and we do not believe that said editor is one bit smarter than was the great Agnostic, or that he has access to sources of information not then open to the scientific student. But what condemnation can be too severe for a creed so abominable that its educated defenders here in this evening twilight of the Nineteenth century dare hint that such a man as Thomas Henry Huxley is now suffering the tortures of an eternal hell because he had too much brain to believe in that creed's inanities and monstrosities?

In Tennessee, as in New York, the enforcers of law "because it is law," do not attempt to enforce it equally. The Dayton Leader, in an article showing that the Adventists of Rhea county are the victims of a discriminating persecution, says that "the grand juries that indicted them ignored the 'lawlessness' of the 400 or 500 men who work within sight of the court house every Sunday, and went five miles away to find indictments against a little band of Seventh-Day Adventists down at Graysville." And the judge who almost sheds tears every time he submits to the painful duty of enforcing the law "because it is law," against some poor Adventist, conveniently shuts his eyes when he turns his head in the direction of these hundreds of "Sabbath-breakers," and so escapes the necessity of calling the attention of the grand jury to their "defiance of law." The Leader also says that it is "credibly informed that some of the very men who were most active in finding indictments against Seventh-Day Adventists have been guilty of laboring at their usual vocations of life all day Sunday more than once within the past five weeks." There is nothing strange in this, for injustice breeds hypocrites as stagnant water does musketoes. We are credibly informed that while Commissioner Roosevelt is trampling in the name of "law" rough-shod over the citizens of this city he is a member of a fashionable club where all kinds of drinks are disposed of on Sunday without let or hindrance.

"Darwin, Tyndall, and Huxley have now gone, and the evolution theory which they propagated appears to be going with them. Religion survives and never was more strongly entrenched in the intellect and the heart of mankind."—Catholic Review.

Evidently the Review has the happy faculty of seeing only that which it wants to see. The fact is, the evolution theory is accepted by practically the entire scientific world. It has possession of the great independent institutions of learning and is forcing its way into the denominational schools everywhere. That the world has accepted it is shown by the many efforts made by Christian writers to reconcile the Bible with it. No one pretends to try to fit it to the Bible; the effort is to put into the Bible a meaning that will permit its devotees to retain their superstition and at the same time keep up with the march of science. The fight of the Catholic church against the new biology and the new science of religious development is as vain as was her fight against the new astronomy and the new geology. Already there are indications that some very prominent Catholics see the handwriting on the wall. Has not the Catholic Review heard the bugles sounding the retreat? Perhaps there is no other man in the church in America who has been so warmly praised by his fellow-churchmen for his learning and his able defense of the faith as has Rev. Dr. J. A. Zahm, professor of physical sciences in Notre Dame University, Indiana. He has recently been lecturing before the Columbian Roman Catholic Summer school at Madison, Wisconsin. One of his addresses bore the title, "The Simian Origin of Man," and in it he said that there is nothing in Roman Catholic dogma which precludes the view that man is descended from an ape-like animal. "Religion survives," even in the Catholic church, by adapting itself to the facts it can no longer conceal or successfully dispute, and so now we are treated to the spectacle of "the evolution theory . . . going" into the Roman Catholic book of dogmas! The church that does not recast her creeds to adapt them to the growing intelligence of the age is doomed to extinction, unless she can induce the state to strengthen her weakness with its power. The theocratic spirit is the one enemy we have to fear, and if we relax our vigilance and lay down our arms we are lost. Given the equal freedom of citizens and every church of supernaturalism will in due time be dislodged from its intrenchments in "the intellect and the heart of mankind."

When our state legislatures and Congress are once fully set up in the business of interpreting the conflicting texts of the Bible preparatory to passing laws to govern the people in matters of religion and morals, won't there be lively times at the state capitols and in Washington! Does someone say that it will never come to that, even if the Christian amendment to the Constitution is adopted? How could such a result be prevented? As a matter of fact, the theocrats themselves know that it would come to this and they are ready to welcome this condition of chronic religious war. Listen to the Christian Statesman as it discusses the possible foundations for the proposed church to be composed of the united orthodox Protestant churches of the present time:

"It is not wise to attempt to make the Bible itself, uninterpreted and in its simple letter the sole fundamental creed of the church. As seen in a former article, the inspired and infallible word of God is to be acknowledged as supreme, authoritative law. The final appeal must be to that in all moral questions in both church and state. But the state and church must for themselves determine what the teachings of this divine word are by the best interpretation which each in its own sphere of duty can reach."

Think of the cat-and-dog time there will be in Congress when representatives of the Catholics, Presbyterians, Methodists, Episcopalians, Baptists, Universalists, Dunkards, Plymouth Brethren, Disciples, United Brethren, Lutherans, and the rest get to quarreling over the interpretation of the "inspired and infallible word of God"! And could anything be more ridiculous and paradoxical than the notion that the "inspired and infallible" testament of the infinite Wisdom could need to be interpreted? Even if there was room for doubt about the proper interpretation of the infallible, it could be interpreted only by men who are themselves infallible, and we doubt if the Christian Statesman itself will dare claim that even Presbyterian doctors of divinity are infallible. But in practice it would amount to this, for the Presbyterians, if the dominating element in legislation, would insist that their interpretation of the Bible be made the law of the land and they would use all the resources of the civil power to compel the minority to accept that interpretation as embodied in law. Of course that is all nothing more than a mere bird lure, that talk about the church and state interpreting the Bible each "in its own sphere." The theocrats confidently expect that the legislators, elected by the votes of Christians, will give the same interpretation to the Bible that the church does, just as to-day the law-makers are asked to accept the church's opinions concerning Sunday observance and marriage. By the way, one of the chief reasons why the theocrats want the Bible "interpreted," instead of being accepted literally, is because in the latter event they would be compelled to give up the Catholic Sunday and accept the old Testament Sabbath (Saturday) as their holy day.

The Independent says that its sympathies are with "those who are trying to establish a non-sectarian public school system" in Manitoba. Our neighbor must have some exclusive source of information. We have not heard that there is any movement in Manitoba to establish such a system. To be sure, the Freethinkers there are anxious to make public education wholly secular, but they do not control the legislation of the province, and they are not at the front in the present fight, for the good reason that it is a fight between the bigoted Catholics on the one hand and the bigoted Protestants, the Orangemen, on the other. Mr. Joseph Martin was the originator of the movement against the Catholic separate schools, but it was his desire and intention to abolish the Protestant as well as the Catholic schools and establish a purely secular system. In 1889 he said that "anything short of absolute secularization of the schools would be a gross injustice to the Catholics," and he appealed to the Protestant clergy to assist him in establishing a system of secular education. He held to this opinion and in 1890 he introduced his famous bill, as it was finally shaped by the Protestant clergy. His just ideas were disregarded by the Protestant churches and Catholic schools were abolished and Protestant schools retained. Mr. Martin then protested against the discrimination, and he has done so often since 1890. In a recent letter he manfully says:

"When I introduced the school bill of 1890, I pointed out that, in so far as it provided for religious exercises in the schools, it was, in my opinion, defective. I am of those who deny the right of the state to interfere in any respect in matters of religion. I said then, and I still think, that the clause of the 1890 act which provides for certain religious exercises is most unjust to the Roman Catholics. If the state is to recognize religion in its school legislation, such a recognition as is acceptable to Protestants only, and, in fact, to a majority of Protestants only, is, to my mind, rank tyranny."

The Hon. Mr. Martin should have added that the measure was equally unjust to the Freethinkers, the Jews, the Adventists, and all other classes of citizens who are opposed to a state religion. It is the "rank tyranny" which Mr. Martin condemned that the Manitoban government persists in against the decision of the English Privy Council, against the Dominion government, and, what is more important, against the protests of the dissenting minorities in Manitoba itself. It is this "rank tyranny" which W. J. H. Traynor, president of the Supreme Council of the leading Protestant patriotic order in the United States, in his annual address, says must be continued at all hazards, and that if the Manitoban quarrel between sectarists of opposing schools leads to war, "the Protestants of Manitoba" have but to call for aid, and "across the border will flock" an "army corps" of Protestants from the United States. Are the friends of peaceful progress, of scientific education, of genuine secularization, ready to assist, directly or indirectly, those who avow their willingness to involve the United States in war with Canada for the purpose of maintaining state-supported Protestant schools in Manitoba? It should be said, in passing, that the Manitoba legislature, which the Independent evidently thinks is devoted to things "non-sectarian," has just enacted a law prohibiting the running of Sunday cars in any part of the province.

News and Notes.

From the romance of the North—its mountains and lakes, the spirit of Burns and Scott, the flowers and the heather—I come to the enormous city of Manchester, which seems to represent everything that is practical—facts, facts, facts—industry, commerce, machinery, cotton—pounds, shillings, and pence. I enjoyed the contrast. It added piquancy to this wonderful journey of human life. There is romance and poetry in Manchester mills if we could only get at them, if we only had the myriad-minded vision.

I suppose that the goods of Manchester are sent to every quarter of the globe. Manchester, like London, is an original center of business. It is a fountain-head. It is not a reflex or a dependency. If London were swept out of existence, Manchester would not feel the shock. She would still go on her way rejoicing. Manchester really claims to be as large a congregation of the world's traffic as London itself. She will not yield the palm to Glasgow as the second city in the empire. Manchester proper contains about 650,000 people, and Glasgow proper nearly 800,000. As a matter of fact, however, the Manchesterites claim Salford, since only a narrow stream runs between the cities; the business is all one; and a stranger can't tell whether he is in Manchester or Salford, so intimately are the two cities combined; and Salford has a population of 250,000, which makes the population of the "living whole" of this immense metropolis 900,000. Furthermore, it is stated that within a radius of ten miles of Manchester Exchange is a population as large as that of London itself: that is, taking a space of ground in Lancashire as large as that of total London, it contains an equal number of people. Whether these statements are exaggerations or not, they tend to give some idea of the enormous and multiplied activities of this mighty city. Vast and amazing are the channels of life that flow and intermingle. Crowds flock from every point of the compass. The Manchester Exchange is the largest in the world. On Tuesdays and Fridays 6,000 people throng there simply to do business, and the transactions run up into millions. It is a picture to look upon, that changing multitude on the vast floor of this tall building, the surges of which, we might say, are felt to the uttermost corners of the earth. Looking through the huge thick glass plates of surrounding rooms and corridors you can scarcely hear a sound of that living sea. You would think that nothing was going on. They simply seem to be walking, talking, laughing, and having a good time. Nevertheless, more business is transacted on this one spot than upon any other spot of the same size on the globe, London and New York not excepted, for the time being. When one strikes Manchester he feels the "thrill of life" as when he strikes Chicago, or any other big place; he knows that something is going on. He feels an electricity in the air, which only numbers and world-wide movements can give.

The ship canal, about forty miles in length, I believe, is a wonderful achievement, and adds greatly to the commercial facilities of Manchester, since goods can now be shipped directly to all parts of the world. The canal cost $80,000,000. In the nature of things it can't be a paying investment for many years to come. It requires vast traffic to pay the interest of such an amount on money as the canal cost. But Manchester after all is a prophetic and exuberant city, notwithstanding its purely business nature. It is no Gadgrind. It has boundless faith in the future and the glory of its canal, which will no doubt some day bear a thousand ships upon its bosom. I admire the magnificent energy of a people who will bank $80,000,000 on the possibilities of to-morrow. There is a poetic grandeur in the creation of such a splendid pathway of commerce.

I enjoy the comfortable hospitality of Wm. Westwell, who lives in the suburbs of Manchester, in a quiet retreat, where no throb of business ever disturbs the calm and beautiful atmosphere. There are flowers and grass and trees to charm the eye, and lovely roads over which to drive, and fair prospects in every direction. There is the splendid horse, Robert, and the faithful dog, Wallace, and in the morning and the evening air we enjoy the delightful sceneries with the swift motion and music of the flying wheel. Elegant villas and residences adorn the country, which is rich with groves and luscious hayfields, in some of which the harvest is already filling the air with sweet perfumes and the laborers cheerily sing. At Bolton I saw two of the finest draught-horses, I believe, in the world; one was valued at £1,000, and the other at £800. They seemed almost strong enough to draw an earthquake and make no fuss about it. England surpasses America in draught-horses, although the latter may produce the more lively and handsome trotters. But when it comes to work, England attends to business. There are draught-horses in Manchester that will each pull five tons easily. It seems merely child's play as they place their enormous hoofs on the ground and swing along almost like a planet.

The Secular Society of Manchester is in a flourishing condition. It has strong elements, and fine local talent. It has a hall of its own, which was once a chapel. There is a moral in this, and rather opposes the notion that Christianity is taking the lead of Secularism, for here is a church actually transformed into a Secular hall.

The first time Mr. Foote lectured here the baptismal font was in front, as yet unremoved—a relic of the past fronting the glory of the future. There were no haunting spirits of orthodoxy about, however, as I spoke within these four walls. The building was thoroughly regenerated and prepared for the service of humanity. I had fine audiences, and cheerful English enthusiasm. The evening attendance was especially large. In every way I have enjoyed the Manchester campaign. I have met numerous friends. All give hearty welcome to the American visitor and make him feel entirely at home. It is an inspiring thought that in such a great center of the world's business our flag is kept flying. Such earnest workers as Mr. and Mrs. Pegg and others insure the continued success of our cause. Mr. E. G. Taylor, author of "Shall Thought be Fettered in England?" a most excellent pamphlet, presided at the morning and evening meetings and Mr. Hurd at the afternoon. Quite a number of friends were present from Failsworth, a bright center of Freethought work, where I expect to be August 11th, and of which I shall have a good story to tell, for a really splendid constructive enterprise has been carried on here of great interest to all advanced thinkers. I cannot name all I met at Manchester, but I must thank them one and all for their kindness and generous support.

With Mr. Westwell and Mr. Robert Ainsworth I visited the Exchange, the Municipal buildings, the Art gallery, St. James' Hall, Belle-Vue, and other places of interest and enjoyment. Belle-Vue is one of the old and celebrated curiosities of cosmopolitan Manchester. Excursions from all over the kingdom come here for a day's outing. There are large zoological gardens, extensive lakes, upon which steamboats are plying, concert hall, and a band of music, and at present a huge panorama of Port Arthur—a wonderful affair, giving a most vivid impression of that place. In the evening there is a magnificent display of fireworks, the "Storming of Port Arthur," reproduced in a grandeur and brilliancy which is indescribable. Belle-Vue was started over fifty years ago by one man in a very small way, and has grown to its present colossal proportions as a place of varied amusement and instruction by the energetic genius of the founder and his sons. The railroad company has offered, I understand, £250,000 for the place, but the proprietors refuse to dispose of it for that or any other sum. It is their pride and glory to make this the best thing of its kind in the kingdom.

St. James' is one of the largest halls in the world, capable of holding 8,000 people. Westwell once held a big auction of goods in this place, and sold in one day merchandise to the value of £127,000. I think this is one of the largest business transactions on record.

On Sunday evening I was pleased to meet, at the home of Mr. Westwell, Mr. Karsa, a Mohammedan gentleman, who was present at the evening lecture. I was gratified to find that advanced believers in the Koran are upon the broad and universal platform of Freethought, cordially in touch with science, progressive philosophy, and radical literature.

My visit at Manchester was one of great stimulation. In this great hive of human industry there was still music and poetry, hope and encouragement.

On Monday I reach Derby, where I give a lecture in the evening at Athenaeum Hall. This is quite full. I have already mentioned Derby. The debate was held here between Foote and Lee. I gave a review of that debate, entitling my lecture "Man and the Universe." I gave the salient features of both sides of the debate, which debate certainly has resulted in great good to Secularism. I could see that Mr. Foote's argument had lodged in many an intelligent mind, and that the community was not so densely orthodox as in days gone by. There has been a hard fight at this point. The Sabbatarians endeavored to enforce the old pious laws, and for a time succeeded, but public sentiment is now pronounced against them, and the principles of Freethought are prevailing. The only notable thing about the debate after the lecture was that a woman took part in it, in a very courteous and gentle manner. I could not make out what her position really was, but it seemed more like Swedenborgianism than anything else. It was a vague and indefinite defense of Theism, but not by any means on the orthodox lines. I see that very few are disposed to defend "Christian" Theism. It is Theism pure and simple upon which they rely.

Mr. Henry McGuinness presided at my lecture. I find he is an old army comrade, and fought beneath the Stars and Stripes. I am glad that, on a larger and grander field, we are contending for universal freedom. At his home, after the lecture, with Mr. Whitney and other Secular friends, we had a delightful sociable time, and closed with singing "Auld Lang Syne." Derby is quite a contrast to Manchester, with its tremendous bustle. But I shall not forget the former's rural and stately beauty, its appearance of comfort and wealth, its growing light of Freethought, its cheerful companionship, and splendid band of earnest reformers.

Nottingham is next on my route, and I lecture here Tuesday, June 25th, to a fair audience. There is a very large Liberal element in Nottingham, but somehow or other it is rather indifferent to distinctive Freethought work, and much of it is absorbed in the Socialistic and Independent Labor party. The purely Secular movement is not what it should be in its own field, but there are sturdy supporters here, and I do not think there will be any ultimate failure, for there are those who know that Freethought is the vital spirit of reform, and must be maintained at all hazards. In times of real stress and battle, Nottingham has always been a great rallying-place, and there is no doubt that, if anything special should occur, Nottingham would fill its quota. At present it is a kind of reserve corps.

I remain until Saturday at Nottingham, and have a good rest at the home of Mr. James Stapleton, president of the Nottingham Secular Society. Mr. Snell, one of the best speakers and workers in the English advance movement, introduced me at the lecture and made a very interesting address of welcome, in which he stated that in a certain way Nottingham was the hub of the universe; and that is about so. The New England Pilgrim movement started from near Nottingham. Nottingham Castle dates back to the time of the Britons, and then, as for Nottingham lace, there is nothing like it in the wide world, and the Nottingham girls adorn themselves like queens with the chief productions of their ancient and majestic city. Lace manufacture in its present wonderful skill and variety originated here. This is the only place where they can make the machines, which are indeed like "a thing of life." My friend, Mr. Parrott, who owns one of them, took me to view its marvelous evolutions. I can no more explain them than I can explain the universe. There is an infinity of movement, all prearranged so that at one stroke it seems as if a million fingers were set at work to deftly weave the gorgeous fabric. Fifty-two yards of the finest lace, of any pattern desired, is made on one of these machines every half hour. You might watch the mechanism all day long, and yet not penetrate its mystery. Only in Nottingham can the genius of man produce these superb, tireless creatures that labor day and night with the force of a human intelligence and fill the world with beauty.

Passing from these miracles of modern progress, we take our way to Nottingham Castle, in whose dim recesses the "dark backward and abysm of time" is quaintly revealed. Mrs. Stapleton and my artist friend, Mr. Story, are my companions. Mr. Story has painted some of the pictures now hanging on the walls, and is well up in the history of this famous castle. Of course, only here and there do we find remnants of the original structure, which was built nobody knows when. Some say that the citadel on this rock was reared about the time of King David of scriptural memory, a thousand years before Christ. Others go back only to the ancient Romans and Britons, but there is no doubt that this great rock which towers above the city has been a battlemented fortress in one shape or another for many centuries. At present the main structure is a castellated mansion of comparatively modern date, having itself suffered mutilation in the days of Chartist reform; but still to be seen is Mortimer's Hole, where the wicked earl courted the amorous queen, to be finally detected and executed at Tyburn. There is also the "New Jerusalem," where beer is still vended to the thirsty wayfarer, and which was furnished centuries ago from the same place to the holy crusaders; hence its name. In the mansion as it now stands are the art gallery and museum, and one can spend a whole day viewing the treasures of this unique and memorable castle.

Friday is a brilliant day in the annals of the Secular Pilgrim. I visit Newstead Abbey, the home of Lord Byron. Mr. Stapleton and Mr. Parrott are with me on this trip. Newstead Abbey is only about eight miles from Nottingham. It was in Nottingham that Byron lay in state. I was pointed to the very room, in an ancient building, where he thus lay. An immense procession followed the funeral cortege to Hucknall church, where the poet was buried with sixty of his ancestors. There is nothing more beautiful in any land than Newstead Abbey. It is now owned by Mr. W. F. Webb, a friend of Livingstone, and himself a renowned traveler and hunter. He must possess great wealth, for the Abbey is kept in a most noble and attractive condition. It is approached from the station by a wide graveled road through green fields and beautiful groves. We pass over the river, alongside a dashing cataract which flows from the lake above. The Abbey is of the loveliest architecture of the middle ages. It is grace itself, and indicates the wonderful poetic feeling of that awakening time, a dawn gemmed with a thousand stars. Only the front arches of the church itself remain, with the windows and the portal, giving a weird faint picture of immemorial years. The habitable part still endures, in which are hundreds of relics of the poet and his ancestors; the rooms where kings have visited and slept; portraits of beauties and heroes; swords and helmets; and the table where Byron wrote his immortal verse, in which there was more concentrated energy of genius than in any other poetry of his time, and which was ablaze with revolutionary thoughts. We see the surroundings that nurtured the mental life of the fitful bard; the ruins of the past and the beauties of nature; the fields and groves and waters; the Annesley hills, where brooded the spirit of his fatal love. We can imagine the poet amidst these variable scenes, so many pictures of which abide in his glowing melodies. Newstead Abbey is rich with treasures, and the gloomy history of man is here recorded, together with its most marvelous romance and illustrious genius. Here is the oak which Byron planted and which, once on the point of dying, now flourishes green and beautiful. Here is the tree on which he carved his own and his sister's name when he bade farewell forever to Newstead Abbey; and here is the monument to his dog, who possessed all the virtues without the vices of man. About the Abbey are extensive and magnificent gardens, in which are flowers of all hues, spreading along the wanderer's path with oriental luxuriance.

From Newstead Abbey we go to Hucknall, a colliery town, smoky and dirty, and busy with marketing; an uncouth place, it seemed to me, for the ashes of the immortal bard. The church is a solemn but not very imposing structure. A melancholy graveyard spreads around it. No one of distinction is buried here. Within are the immortal dead. The bones of Byron lie beneath the stone floor. We read the inscription, and muse in the shadow of the gray walls. An unpretentious mansion of the dead is this—a gloomy place to quench the fires of the human mind that flame to the stars, then sink to earth. All this, and nothing more! was the refrain that rolled through my mind, as I gazed upon the dim relics of the dead. No voice can utter anything more. The darkness abides while we love and honor the heroic spirit. Byron perished in the glorious effort to win liberty for Greece; and more than this, be it spoken to his undying praise, Byron's maiden speech in the House of Lords was for the defense of the Nottinghamshire workmen, among whom he then lived, against the death penalty which the aristocrats were endeavoring to inflict upon those poverty-stricken men who in their blind wrath destroyed some machinery, thus putting the rights of wealth above the rights of humanity. Against this Byron protested with all the ardor of his soul and the eloquence of his tongue.

Besides the memory of Lord Byron in Nottingham, there is the house where Henry Kirke White was born; and also in the process of demolition the birthplace of Philip James Bailey, who, half a century ago, at the age of twenty-two, wrote "Festus," a most extraordinary and brilliant poem, and although living to this day, he has not again penned a line worthy of preservation. There is also a house on one of the main streets, still standing and used for a hotel, in the same shape it was in 1460, years before the discovery of America. For over 400 years no alteration has been made in its appearance.

On Saturday morning Mr. J. R. Anderson accompanied me to the university, which is a notable and flourishing institution. It has over 1,700 students. It has a machinery and engineering department connected, so that the student can have a practical and industrial education if he wishes. It has also a very valuable museum.

Mr. Anderson is a prominent citizen, a member of the common council, and a pronounced Free-thinker. Among other friends here are Mr. and Mrs. Marriott, formerly of America. Mr. Marriott was in the army under the Stars and Stripes. I had also the pleasure of meeting Mr. Amos Waters, a busy contributor to many literary periodicals, and a philosophical Freethinker. He is known on both sides of the Atlantic.

Mr. Jackson, Mr. Murray, Mr. and Mrs. Burton, with others, are friends that added to the pleasure of my stay in Nottingham. I had a varied and entertaining visit, which, while restful, was animated and instructive. I must thank Mr. and Mrs. Stapleton and the little children for their cordiality and good will, and the enjoyment of a happy home, and I heartily reciprocate the wish of my host that I shall see Nottingham again before I surrender the ghost.

On Saturday afternoon, June 29th, I leave Nottingham for Sheffield. I am accompanied by Mr. Snell, who, I hope, will sometime visit me in America. He would like Yankeeland, I am sure, for a change. And the Freethinkers of our country would find in him a bright and brave champion.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Labor, the Measure of Economic Values.

This subject, important mainly in the degree it is misapprehended, is now being widely discussed. A recent writer says: "The present chaos in financial matters is due in a large measure to the fact that the unit of value is a fixed quantity of a scarce and fluctuating commodity." It is made the only legal tender for the payment of general indebtedness, and excludes the true measure of value, labor. Labor is the only standard approaching exactness. The unit is the labor or service hour, a labor day being an uncertain number of hours. It is preferable to call it the average product of the labor hour, to meet the objection that labor is an abstraction, and cannot measure concreted values, though values are ideal, not concrete.

What is the average product of the hour is ascertainable in every human employment. Were this otherwise, no intelligent estimate of any commodity or service whatever could be made. The utilities of things have no exchangeable value until they are measured by the services which produce them, or will be required to reproduce them, or are the equivalent which they will command in the market.

Commercial values are based on:

First, the ratio of utility.

Second, the ratio of time—duration of labor.

Third, the ratio of energy exerted.

The first and second ratios are capable of mathematical ascertainment. The last only is variable. The strength, skill, and opportunity of men differ; still more the estimates of schooled and unschooled minds. One delights in action, another in ease. One has refined tastes, another gross appetites. One is satisfied with remote, the other demands instant gratification. When men exchange goods the determining thought is the ratio of profit, interest, rent, i. e., the increment over labor cost to each. Surely no commodity produced by labor can measure the variation of these estimates, still less the ever varying relation between demand and supply, as Mr. Kitson has conclusively shown in his recent book. If his "invariable unit of purchasing power" is anything more than a hypothetical abstraction, it suggests the average product of the industrial hour. Invariability is out of the question. Only an approximation is possible, but this is adequate to determine the equity of all practical transactions.

There are reasons to be urged in favor of a multiple standard, but this would lead to more complication than the estimation of the labor hour, and at the best could not equal it in exactness.

By taking, however, a common article of food, say wheat; one of clothing, say wool; one of shelter, say lumber, with one or more of wrought metal, say iron, and of wool or coal, the average price of these articles in relation to each other might furnish a tolerable measure, for each market day; but only the labor hour can measure exchangeable values for all time; since time, utility of natural resources, and sacrifice of energy, as far as ascertainable, are in this respect the nearest to invariability.

The labor hour, or its average product, would be put in the form of a receipt or note, for labor done, or to be done. Experience shows that such receipt or note will readily pass in exchange, if from a party, corporation, or state in which the public have tolerable confidence. But here the ways part. The issuer of the receipt or certificate is not a buyer, but a custodian of the goods, and can justly be held to account for their delivery, or their value. There are unquestioned equities here. And if the certificate passes into other hands, and returns in form of draft, it is upon a plenum. A promissory note is a quite different thing. It is for a thing non-existent. The borrower may fail in his pursuit. He may have received only the banker's promise, who also is unable to pay on demand, and so both promises are often repudiated. I think this shows that our bankruptcies arise not from difficulty of getting in debt, but from too great facility. But says the mutual banker: "By our plan good credits can be exchanged for circulating credit." Thus money can be had without interest. But debt money is a liability, for which an asset is yet to be procured, and cannot be redeemed on demand. It is replied that an asset is not needed; "for it is in the very essence of money-issuing that it is done on other people's property."

To me it seems that the desire to issue money on other people's property, and to do business on other people's capital, is far more responsible for our defalcations and financial troubles than legal tender laws or taxation of bank issues. If our money measure of exchange values is to consist of evidences of debt, representing consumption, not value produced, there can be no end to failures.

Indebtedness is excluded from among the determinate economic factors. It adds nothing to capital, increases no lands or their fertility, or tools or plant of any kind. By making a commodity, as gold, a measure of value and including debts as matters of commerce, we simply invert the industrial order. Money we crown king. It does everything. Man is valued only as the product of his hour's labor becomes purchasable. This inversion was unnoticed when men were owned as chattels, and is still unnoticed under monarchical commerce by our most honest and intelligent money reformers. Man, dethroned from his work estate, supinely worships still the emblem of departed power, the golden fetic, which ignorance and knavery have set up in the place of all that is called God. The Dollar Almighty, displaying its government legend, "In God we Trust," is far more devoutly worshiped than was ever any god of ancient or modern time.

The absurdity of the single commodity standard reminds one of the landsman who came into possession of a vessel, and made marks upon her side to tell when the tide rose and fell. This was useful when she was aground, but quite useless when she was afloat. By accident he found out that it would also indicate the measure of the burden his vessel was sustaining. The only serviceable function the commodity standard can render social industry is to record the burden it loads upon labor. A gold dollar or its counterfeit paper dollar will now command ten hours of productive labor. It will command only one hour's service of a bank teller, or a half hour's service of a cashier. The hour of the laborer can be purchased for a dime. The hour of the hundred millionaire, spent in work, play, or dissipation, costs the wealth producers several thousand dollars. This should be satisfactory! When Mr. Tucker was asked his opinion of the labor standard, he replied: "It is doubtful if there is anything more variable in its purchasing power than labor." He has marked his boat, and evidently has not reflected whether it is afloat or aground. The astute Senator Edmunds also thought the royal commodity gold the most stable of all things in value, because in thirty years he had never known its price to vary more than three-fourth per cent from the standard coin, itself gold. He did not count the time when silver was at three per cent premium over gold. His financial vessel was afloat with a mark to indicate the constant undulation of the commercial tide.

I have not the least expectation that for many years the labor hour will be legally adopted as the standard or tender unit. It could do little good if it were, with our barbarous laws for collection of debts and enforcement of usurious contracts. It might prove in some way a reminder of labor's burdens. A standard is but an accident in Andrews's analysis of money, and has thus far proved a very damaging one to industrial undertakings. Doubtless a generally acknowledged standard would be convenient were it exact. But the adoption of the most inexact has wrought untold wrong to labor. Only under liberty can the equitable standard be used.

Not only do the mutual bankers regard a standard or no standard of too great importance, but they greatly exaggerate the economic function of money itself. It is but an incident of exchange, if more than an accident. Exchange itself is not a prime factor, but an incident to the production, division, and distribution of wealth.

Edward Kellogg was the father of the one per cent cost of banking idea, and thought two per cent interest too much for the borrower to pay. He was contemporary with Proudhon, Greene, and Warren.

He and Warren were merchants, with little knowledge of the production of wealth. Proudhon and Greene were literary men with still less. Kellogg laid down as a fundamental, that "monetary laws are the most important subjects of legislation." By this he meant much the same as our mutual bankers do, who put the money question above the land and labor, the home and the man and the woman. Even Mr. Kitson, with all his fairness and catholicity of spirit, does the same.

What ought to be sufficiently clear is that land borrowing, money and capital borrowing, are but surrenders to weakness, the great vice of our industrial system, sapping the energy and depleting the resources of human providence. Labor has always been the procurer of economic values, which measure and exchange each other relatively to the embodied service in each.

How contract, which has ever served the slaveries with such fidelity, is to figure in the mutual bank era, seems doubtful. Only Mr. Bilgram meets the question squarely, by premising that the borrower who fails to fulfil his contract freely entered into, is an invader, and to be treated by organized or extemporized governments accordingly. Were his premises sound, the logic of his conclusion could not be questioned; but freedom of contract has no existence under monopoly of land and opportunity. Equal freedom is a dream of the idealist, and useful only as a hypothesis to test positiv social ethics. Debtor and creditor are not often equals, whose agreements can result advantageously to both. As a rule "the debtor is a slave to the lender." Except under the rule of "equal freedom of invasion," can he be regarded as an invader?

An attempt to exchange where one party has no commodity is an absurdity. Deferred payments are encouragements to laches, and outside of economic consideration. Where hazardous enterprises are inaugurated with capital on one side and labor on the other, the parties are not debtor and creditor, but co-operators. Only when the issue is mutually advantageous or disadvantageous, can it come under the rule of reciprocity. When disaster overtakes such enterprise, a contributor thereto has "no cause of action" against another contributor. A creditor is a contributor to his debtor's failure, when by taking interest he destroys him, or when he furnishes him means too great for him to manage. No mutual or really free contract exists where the completion of it is not equally advantageous to both parties. Where reciprocity, the law of societary motion, is absent, there can be no mutuality. We are as yet not under freedom, but authority, and are subject to invasion on every side, particularly in the opportunities of producing and sharing wealth. If indebtedness is necessary, other than the necessity caused by unequal laws and voluntary yielding to unfavorable circumstance, men cannot be helped by increasing the facilities for borrowing. Men with industry, push, and general integrity will be able to establish a business of their own, capital or no capital. Men without these qualities will not be benefited, but injured by devices for "borrowing made easy."

The scientific basis of economics was laid by Adam Smith more than a century since, and indorsed by Proudhon nearly a half century since, viz., that the whole product of labor belongs to the laborer. Neither applied it, however, in his economic philosophy. Smith saw hope for oppressed labor in "free trade." Proudhon deemed that "the chief hope of labor lies in the monetization of all its products," and so his whole thought was turned to the subject of reforming money and the organization of credit. His disciples do not see that only by recognizing the labor hour as the standard can his "chief hope" be realized. But the fundamental right to labor and to hold its products is anterior to money, and even to exchange. Freedom to use one's normal environment, to co-operate in and mutually divide its fruitage, is prior to money or any of its accidents or incidents. So intently was Proudhon's attention directed to righting labor's wrongs through financial measures, that it is said he expressed a determination to reverse the motion of the planet to effect it. In this diversion from the fundamental question, he has been followed or anticipated by Kellogg, Warren, Greene, and all finance reformers who think to reform basic evils by rearranging the incidentals and accidentals of exchange, while the plutocratic power rests securely on the dominion of the land, excluding labor from place and power of self-employment, and upon the support of the forceful state, and the popular superstition concerning the legal and regal dollar of gold, or other commodity, or their ghosts.

The first exchanges are of services, counted by hours; the second are of the products of services, and their values are arrived at by the measure of time, utility, and energy involved in the labor of production. There is no reason but such as invasive government and plutocratic greed suggest why the same measure should not apply to the wider range of general circulation. To use debt as an economic quantity is to organize bankruptcy, as Proudhon says. To treat transactions as exchanges, when one or both of the commodities are non-existent, terminates in laws to stay completion, to exempt and limit indebtedness, and otherwise protect the debtor. Equal freedom may not prohibit knaves and fools from making vicious contracts. It certainly will refuse to enforce them. Mutualism must be applied to production, division, and exchange before it has any meaning in banking, the normal function of which is to adjust balances and facilitate completion of half-executed exchanges. Practically under legal supervision, and with a legal commodity standard, banking is simply a contrivance to create and circulate debts and to defer payments indefinitely. Let us have the labor-hour receipt or check, with the legend, "In Industry we Trust and Work."

J. K. INGALLS.

Observations.

I know of two cities out West between whose residents there is such a degree of rivalry that a judge in one of them discharged a thief who had stolen a warrant drawn on the treasury of the other, taking the judicial ground that the paper couldn't be worth enough to make the offense indictable. I supposed that local feeling of this kind was confined to America, but Mr. Putnam's letters from abroad have given me more light. Of course it is not for a stranger to question anything told him by Englishmen, who never talk through their hats, and hence the Pilgrim is bound to report that every city he visits, while in the provinces of Great Britain, is, in importance, the second in the United Kingdom. Of this class, according to statistics furnished by residents of each, are Glasgow, Liverpool, and Manchester. As to which is the most copious of British streamlets there is likewise a conflict of testimony. In Liverpool they say it is the Mersey, while Editor Foote of the Freethinker asserts that "the Thames is far and away the premier river of England." But then, Mr. Foote lives in London, which is on the Thames. It may yet be necessary to have new measurements made, under circumstances of international publicity, by disinterested parties who would be above suspicion of using a bucket with a bottom half-way to the top. The canny Scot who presented the claims of the Clyde as a bigger piece of engineering than the Suez canal, and who misled the American visitor into recording that the first steamboat was launched upon the same, is probably beyond the reach of prayer.

With Puritanism in the saddle, the editor of the New York Voice (Prohibition) becomes vocal and insolent. To those who protest against persecution by Sabbatarians he says, "Obey the law," while objectors to sumptuary legislation as "foreign to our constitution" are advised to "try the Keeley cure." The statesmanship here displayed is rather more than worthy of the cause which has turned it loose.

Because the communication of Mr. Morris M. Bostwick, printed elsewhere in this paper, appears to be devoted to answering something that I have said, it should not be thence inferred that I would deny to Christianity the ancestry which he gives it. But I do not believe the child was wise enough to know its own father, and I do not believe that it is or ever was sun-worship. Mr. Bostwick's introduction of the matter of evolution illustrates the case. For as man is not an ape, and never was an ape, though man and ape had a common ancestor who left his mark upon both, so we may deny that Christianity has ever been worship of the sun. We might as reasonably assure a Christian that he was once some other kind of an animal, as that his religion was once something else than the superstition built upon the alleged life and adventures of a man known as Jesus Christ. Similarity of structure proves the relationship, but the lines of development diverge in one case as in the other. I call Mr. Bostwick's attention to the item that I have not said religion had its origin in lies and inventions. I could not make such a statement, for the reason, first, that I was not there when it was born, and second, that investigation appears to show that it had its rise in shadows and dreams. But when we come to particular kinds of religion, Christianity for example, and read about resurrections, ascensions, exorcisms, and so forth, we are justified in pronouncing the stories inventions and in concluding that the man who told them must have lied.

I cannot accept the thought of Mr. Bostwick regarding Professor Huxley's attainments as a theological disputer, although the editor of the Christian Advocate agrees with him that in discussing religion Huxley was out of his sphere. In his debates with Mr. Gladstone and the Rev. Dr. Wace, both of which dealt with religious propositions, he displayed all the knowledge needed to get the best of the argument. His selection of the Miltonic theory of creation as a contrast to that of evolution was not due to a lack of moral courage. He knew that Milton was an orthodox interpreter of scripture, while he himself was not; and since Genesis had to be "interpreted" before it could be dealt with, he chose Milton's rendering. If he had undertaken to set forth his own notions of the meaning of Genesis, theologians would have said that his criticism rested upon a misunderstanding of the sacred text. This being the fact, credit should be given him for the scientific caution which he used. His essays on "Science and Hebrew Tradition" and on "Science and Christian Tradition" contain no inherent evidence that the professor was short of sand. If, contrary to Taylor, he regarded Christ as a man, like the baker's dozen of saviors who had previously been crucified, he would have deprived us of the benefit of his thought if he had not said so. Equally candid is his opinion that the assumption of Prof. Edwin Johnson, that Christianity is only a few hundred years old, has nothing in it.

The way the Home Rulers, Labor Reformers, and Socialists of Great Britain knifed one another's candidates in the late elections recalls a poem printed a few years ago describing a little incident which occurred in Parliament. The proceedings were as follows:

'Twas when O'Connor spoke, the crowd
Grew patriotic truly;
For then O'Dooley struck O'Dowd,
And Healey struck O'Dooley.
Then Redmond hit Muldoon a swat,
And all went well, begorry,
And there was home rule on that spot
Till to his feet O'Connor got
And says, says he, "For sayin' what I did," says he, "I'm sorry."

The conference of political reformers at Prohibition Park, Staten Island, appears to have performed according to program. The purpose of it was to establish a basis of union for members of all parties except Republicans and Democrats, and it resulted in resolutions embodying the following demands:

1. Direct legislation, the initiative and referendum, imperative mandate and proportional representation.
2. State control of the larger industries.
3. Election of president and senators by direct vote of the people.
4. Woman suffrage.
5. Use and occupancy of land necessary to tenure.
6. Prohibition.
7. Government monopoly of the circulating medium.
8. Free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1.

The foregoing may be regarded as eight kinds of bait thrown out by the Prohibition party for the purpose of catching votes. It is reported that the convention took them all down, though its gorge rose at the last one, which is not to be wondered at in view of the mixture it had previously swallowed. Anything with the word "free" in it is foreign substance to the Prohibition stomach. Mr. Thaddeus B. Wakeman was there and stirred up the animals with the remark that temperance was a secular question, and that the Prohibition party, by taking the theological view, had placed its sluggish form squarely across the pathway of reform.

The religious editor may often, by a few words written during a period of special illumination, place his readers under a debt that the business manager can never collect. He must get his reward in the hereafter, if he gets it at all. The editor of the New York Independent is one of this creditor class, becoming such through his published estimate of the late Thomas H. Huxley. He remarks that Mr. Huxley was a man with "a smattering of insufficient philosophy," and belonged to that kind of individuals who "cannot believe much beyond what they see." Only inspiration could have conveyed that information to the brain of the editor, for nothing in Huxley's writings gives a hint of it. The question whether the deceased had a smattering of philosophy, insufficient or adequate, cannot be settled now that he is dead, but he left testimony over his own signature that his belief was not restricted to what came under his immediate observation. A certain writer named Lilly, in an article contributed to the Fortnightly Review in 1886, endeavored to describe the mental state of Mr. Huxley, and to that end set up three theses embodying the professor's heresies, and likewise those of Mr. W. K. Clifford and Mr. Herbert Spencer. These three gentlemen, said Mr. Lilly, were agreed "(1) in putting aside, as unverifiable, everything which the senses could not verify; (2) everything beyond the bounds of physical science; (3) everything which could not be brought into a laboratory and dealt with chemically." Mr. Huxley accredited the writer with the gift of telepathy, which is a Theosophical endowment enabling one person to read the thoughts of another; only Mr. Lilly's gift was much more wonderful than the ordinary article, since it enabled him read not only thoughts of which the thinker himself was unaware, but those of which he knew nothing, and also to see him unconsciously drawing conclusions which he repudiated and supporting doctrines which he detested. Huxley overlooked the explanation that, like the editor of the Independent, Mr. Lilly may have been inspired. Anyone can understand, after a moment's reflection, that if Mr. Huxley put aside as unverifiable all that the senses could not verify, he would have no use for his intellectual faculties, since what the senses recognize is merely raw material. Secondly, ignoring all that physical science can deal with, consciousness must be denied. Physical science cannot even explain the phenomena of blushing, nor kindred manifestations sometimes attributed to a determination of blood in other directions. In fact, back of all the senses is a body of matter called the brain, with the operations of which physical science is quite unable to deal. Thirdly, what man of sanity would think of taking to the chemical laboratory for analysis such things as history, philology, or mathematics, to the study of which Mr. Huxley often devoted his attention? The professor showed that the first of Mr. Lilly's theses was inaccurate, that the second was inaccurate, and that the third was inaccurate; and that these three inaccuracies constituted one prodigious misrepresentation. Where, then, in his vast vocabulary would the great student of nature have found a word to fitly characterize the Independent's statement? In my opinion he would for once have become boisterous, and denounced it as unhistorical.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

The Cause in Oregon.

Oregon City is a very prosperous and pretty place, and a bright oasis in the desert of hard times. The falls on the Willamette are utilized by paper mills, woolen factories, and the electric company, which affords light and power to her more pretentious sister, Portland.

That stalwart and loyal Liberal, Ben. F. Jagger, and his family, are shining lights and do much to dispel the darkness of superstition. Friend Jagger is ever kind, genial, courteous, of more than average business ability, and the success that has rewarded his management of his own affairs secures him the confidence and respect of his fellow-citizens, as was evinced by his election as councilman, because there arose great and pressing need of a really able and conscientious man on the board. It was the same with the county; when honest administration of the board of commissioners was the one hope to save the county from bankruptcy, the people, unsolicited, by an overwhelming majority, chose young Mr. Jagger, and this despite both father and son being the most pronounced Infidels.

Friend Jagger rented Pond's Hall, the best in the city, and met all the expenses of two lectures. At the first lecture there were about seventy present, and the second night one hundred and twenty. Much interest and enthusiasm was awakened, though the city was intensely excited over the reception of the delegates to the convention of the G. A. R.

It was represented to me that this was a hopeless field, but, on the contrary, I found it one of the most promising. Mr. Jagger hopes to secure a suitable lot, and, if he can do this on reasonable terms, proposes to build a hall and have it dedicated to Freethought. There is a very general demand for Miss Nettie Olds to lecture there.

Portland Secular Sunday-school participated in the Fourth of July parade. We had a float, 20x18—18 feet high—built by Mr. John J. Tracy. Along the bed of the float, 20 feet long, were letters 18 inches high, shaded red and blue, reading on the one side, "Universal Mental Liberty," and on the other, "To Do Good Is Our Religion." Arches on each side extended 20 feet with 5 foot crown on which, in letters 14 inches high, were the words, "Portland Secular Sunday-school." On the horses were banners 5 feet by 3; on those in the lead, "Reason," "Right," on the wheelers, "Truth," "Justice."

The float was three tiers high, with canopy at the apex in which Miss Nettie Olds was seated dressed as "Goddess of Freethought." The float was covered with bunting and profusely decorated with flags, evergreens, and flowers. The children each wore a beautiful badge, the gift of jolly, genial A. W. Miller, and carried an American flag. There were sixty children and fourteen adults on the float. The children sang patriotic songs over the entire route of more than three miles, to the entertainment and delight of the bystanders, who generally—when the fanaticism was not too malignant—showed their appreciation by hearty and long-continued applause. Even the members of the Salvation Army, seeing the words, "Portland Secular Sunday-school," and not being able to distinguish the difference between the words "Secular" and "Presbyterian," were most hearty in their cheers. It was a grand advertisement of our work.

June 23 was the memorable gala day of the Silverton Liberals, it being the anniversary of the organization of the Silverton Liberal Union. Each year they commemorate that event by having a general gathering, a grand picnic, and in the evening musical and literary entertainment at Universal Mental Liberty Hall, owned by the society.

The city has grown in importance, commercially and numerically, since my first visit five years ago. I was delighted to meet again the brave veterans, and learn that, while so nobly sustaining the cause, they had shared in the general prosperity of the city. The old stand-bys are ready as ever to do all possible for the advancement of Liberalism, but they realize the wisdom of placing the responsibility of carrying on the work upon the younger members.

The election of young Mr. Pearl W. Geer, the representative of a long line of Infidel ancestors, to the position of president of the church and superintendent of the Sunday-school, proves a most wise selection. He made his maiden speech on the Liberal rostrum at the picnic, and gave evidence of the possession of more than ordinary oratorical ability. The way he has conducted and built up interest in the Sunday-school is worthy of the highest commendation.

There was a very large gathering of Liberals from the country around. Among the distinguished and most honored visitors was Father Ben Forstner, his excellent wife, and a goodly delegation of friends from Salem. The Woodburn friends were in full force. This would be a long communication if I enumerated only one-third of the good Liberals who rejoiced the Silverton friends, and enjoyed one of the jolliest, happiest days of their lives at the Silverton picnic.

The evening entertainment at the hall fitly complemented the picnic. Higher praise than that is impossible. Young Mr. Geer and his assistant proved their ability to satisfactorily arrange and carry through a most arduous and brilliantly successful celebration without depending on the old folks for anything but financial aid.

The Portland First Secular Church determined not to halt, and will take no vacation. Having raised the interest to the flood, it cannot afford by any ebb to lose what it has gained. The Sunday-school average attendance is forty-eight children, twenty-three adults, while the interest in the evening meetings is steadily increasing, and adding to the membership material of the highest quality. Sunday evening, July 7th, a most delightful program was rendered. It being the Sunday following the Fourth, Miss Olds took special pains to prepare a patriotic program, and every one of the thirteen numbers reflected credit alike upon child and instructor. The recitations and songs by the tiny darlings of six and eight years were so admirably rendered as to excite the emotion alike of every true patriot and lover of children. The elder children's songs and recitations were not less commendable.

No one can properly estimate the value of a Secular Sunday-school until they see one in actual progress. The participation of the children in the Sunday evening services proves an immense attraction. It is a grand and good thing, and should be introduced wherever there is a Sunday-school and local church. Let every good member of the Oregon State Secular Union make special effort this week to secure one new subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

C. B. REYNOLDS,

Sec. O. S. S. U., 620 Seventh st., Portland, Or.

The address of the secretary of the Brooklyn Philosophical Association is Thomas Duntze, 24 Stockholm street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Omaha (Neb.) Philosophical Society meets every Sunday at 2.30 p.m., in Washington Hall, 18th and Harney streets. Questions pertaining to theology, Freethought, and science freely discussed. All are welcome.

The Freethought Society of Ballard Falls, Kan., has got out a sheet for missionary work by Freethinkers called "The Holy Bible in a Nutshell." It is made up of extracts and paraphrases of Remsburg's, Wheeler's, and other works, "Self-Contradictions of the Bible" being liberally drawn on, with the Nine Demands added and some pertinent questions asked, making on the whole a very good eye-opening leaflet, and the Society is willing that all should help distribute them. The Society itself has distributed ten thousand. They will be furnished at five cents per dozen by addressing Mrs. O. Dalrymple, secretary of the Society, Ballard Falls, Kan.

A Lantern Without the Candle.

It seems rather surprising that, in all the veering away from theology which we have witnessed in our time, men, otherwise skeptical enough, should still profess faith in Jesus. They have given up his divinity, but still cling to his name, or the former half of it, as to that of a most extraordinary man. To my thinking, a greater fallacy or superstition never possessed men. To give up Christ the Son of God and stick to Jesus the son of Mary, seems to me to be an evidence of imbecility or excessive sentiment, in which reason plays no part at all. Jesus without the Christ is a lantern without the candle, and a poor lantern too. If Jesus was the Christ, God's anointed, the Son of God, and God himself, there is some slight modicum of sense in the respect shown to him. But if Jesus was a mere man, Jew or Gentile, there is nothing in that fact to call out our reverence or to lead us to worship him.

Of course, those who so excessively crack Jesus up say they do so because of his wonderful character; but, in sober truth, the boasted character of Jesus is all the invention of his worshippers, and especially of those who have made money out of puffing him. Nor is that all; the boasted character of Jesus was concocted and put upon him or attributed to him, as the Son of God, or while he was too exalted to be regarded in any other light than that of divinity. In a word, if the churches had from the first treated and regarded Jesus as a mere man, as the Unitarians do, he never would have had any character to boast of, for there are no materials out of which to weave it. This is literally true. Why, "Paul" was far more prominent as a man than Jesus ever was. There is no ground of comparison between them. And if you take any one of the prominent martyrs mentioned in Christianity, you will find a character transcendently more striking than that of Jesus. Ignatius, Polycarp, Andrew, Peter, St. Simeon Stylites, the hermit Anthony, and a dozen others, showed self-denial far superior to anything Jesus exhibited. And this must be clear to all who are unprejudiced enough to examine for themselves.

I, of course, do not regard any one of those names as representing a real man, but we have to discuss character in fiction as in real life. Shakespeare's characters, for example, are quite as much distinguished from each other, and must be regarded as quite as moral, immoral, great, little and middling, as real men and women. So must it be with Jesus and his followers. And it seems to me unquestionable that Jesus has been and is completely eclipsed by many of those who have followed him. That is, unless you throw into his scale the element of Godhead, he is outweighed immensely by many a character in church story.

Consequently to take away the divinity of Christ, or rather of Jesus, is really to logically fling him up altogether. For the elements of greatness are entirely wanting. Whoever sketched him relied for effect upon his divinity and nothing else. Take, as an illustration, a pictured saint, such as we see them in Christian art; there they appear with their saintly insignia. But just obliterate the nimbus or the ring of glory over or around the saint's head, and he appears as ordinary a being as you could well imagine. The painter relies upon the trappings of divinity for all the effect he would produce upon the spectator. So with Jesus—the writers depend upon the marvelous, the impossible, for effect. And Jesus, once reduced to mere manhood, is no better than a sucked orange. That is the logic of the position taken up by the Unitarians and by others in the present day. Jesus is all or nothing. Let them have their choice. He is the impossible or the contemptible, like a pope without his infallibility or a priest minus his "reverence," or a rose destitute of color and scent. They may strive while they may, but they must make Jesus everything or nothing at all.—J. Symes, in Melbourne Liberator.

At the Annual Congress of French Freethinkers, 92 delegates from the provinces were present. Speaking of "forgotten" Infidel authors, it is worth noting that the 1878 edition of the complete works of Voltaire has been sold out in France, and of his work "Charles XII," the bookselling firm Reimwald alone has sold 83,500 copies. French Freethinkers contemplate erecting a memorial in honor of the late Maria Deraismes, who died February 6, 1894. A new Freethought Society has been formed at Evreux, France. The Federation du Nord et du Pas-de-Calais and Libre Pensee d'Illiers have also joined the National Federation.

The Central Freethought Society of Venezuela has elected Odón de Buen honorary president. La Nueva Era is getting to the front as an active Freethought journal in Guatemala. Mr. Ramon Vera, editor of our Spanish-American Freethought contemporary, El Progreso, New York, has been meeting with a highly flattering reception from the Freethinkers of Guatemala.

CARLISLE, IA., July 10, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I avail myself of the offer of THE TRUTH SEEKER and "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" for $6.50. I have tried hard to get you some subscribers, but it is a difficult matter to get the people to take the paper, as there are so many who fear the churches. I am the only man that fights the churches openly. I have fought them for the last twenty years, and have been boycotted by all the church people, but I shall fight them as long as I live.

I think THE TRUTH SEEKER the best eye-opener that I ever had the pleasure of reading.

The Press Does Not Tell Its Readers.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., July 8, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In my article, finding Kansas citizens blamable for the imprisonment of Mr. Harman, I did not mean to ignore the fact that the government in Washington was the power that made and keeps Mr. Harman a prisoner; but in looking back to the time and the people that made Kansas a "free state," it seemed to me that instead of the state courts composed of the citizens of the state sitting down and quietly passing along, not even inquiring into or seemingly caring that its noblest citizen was behind prison bars, there ought to be men and women congregating in large numbers everywhere where there are court houses, besieging the officers of courts to find some way to set at liberty such a prisoner.

Where are the Christians that believe their God opened prison doors, that they are not doing as the Christians of fifty years ago did, praying so loud and continuously that other business is compelled to wait till this great wrong is in some way righted?

How hard it is for one worn out and useless to sit still, unable even to get up petitions for the release of such a prisoner!

A Local Allegory.

PARK RIVER, N. DAK., June 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I had the following dream the other night: I thought I saw a big bill posted as follows: "Free Lectures on Sunday next at the Methodist Episcopal church. Subject: 'The Nose.' By Rev. Smeller."

The nose is a natural thing, we all know; it is used for smelling. The bird-dog has the finest specimen of it; he can smell his game far off. Of course that is a natural instinct. The Methodist Episcopal bull-dog works differently. He can smell only tea and high spirits; he barks, bites, and fights according to his nature. Then comes a somewhat strange-looking, long-eared, queer-hallooing creature, not even respecting the laws of nature, for he halloos day and night, and won't let human beings sleep; he also halloos Sunday, but he is excused for Sunday-hallooing on account of his nose; he cannot smell like the Rev. Smeller. The three of them together make a pretty good combination—one does the smelling, the other the barking and biting, and the third the hallooing. There ought to be an injunction on them; if they were blind pigs, there would be, too; but they are not as valuable as pigs; hence they escape the prohibitory laws.

Church Monopoly of Public Functions.

TIPTON, CAL., July 4, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I shall celebrate our national holiday in a fitting manner by starting $4.25 for the place where I think it will do the most good. Send books as per inclosed list and credit balance on my subscription. This is about the extent of my celebration this glorious Fourth. Tipton is observing the day to some extent, but the whole program is under the auspices and control of the church, so I am not in it. When I have written you before from here this was a godless place, but 'tis so no more. Last spring a female evangelist arrived, and she has hauled in all the suckers, which means most of this community. Now our resident minister, who had been here about two years and had never saved a soul, brags about his converts and thinks he is running the town. He is not right, but near it—too near it. He is very brave (in the pulpit), and I have been told that he has often assured his faithful flock that he stands ready to debate the subject of the infallibility of the Bible with any Infidel! He tackled me on the subject when he first came here. I listened to his little story for about twenty minutes, and then asked him to hear me for a moment, which he expressed a willingness to do, but before I had spoken a dozen words he remembered that his breakfast was waiting for him, and left me. He said he would give me another chance, but since that day he will scarcely speak when we meet. Oh, yes, he will debate when no opponent is near.

A Mr. Castle, who has taught our school for the past two years, is an unbeliever. One convert, I am informed, has declared that Castle shall not teach the school any more unless he marches up and joins the church. But we have a school board, neither of whose members is a Christian, and what the church says will not govern their action in the matter.

Yours, F. B. HAWKINS.

A New Convert.

TRENTON, MO., July 8, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have just received a copy of your paper, through the kindness of Mr. Hart, of Kirksville, Mo., and find it very interesting. To liberty-loving Americans it is well worth the price. Of all the papers I have had the privilege of reading, it is the best, and will be the first on my table, when I am able to afford one. A few months ago I took a notion to a professional life, and cast about me to see where I should have the least competition. As the number of those who are working for humanity is small, I have chosen that field of labor. I read the Bible through, then "Facts and Fancies About Science," and ended an Infidel by reading Joseph Cook's lecture on "Conscience." I never read an Infidel work until after I had become an Infidel myself. As soon as I can prepare myself I am going to lecture—hold revival meetings for the benefit of humanity. I shall soon submit some essays to be printed in the form of tracts—not comments on the Bible, which is a threadbare subject, but something of a scientific nature; also answering arguments of the preachers. Yours,

JAS. W. MOONEY.

[Our young friend's resolve to enter the lecture field in the interests of humanity is a commendable one, but let him spend from three to five years in thoroughly reading up in rationalism and science. Let him become acquainted with the history of Freethought, and know what others have written before he writes much himself. Then he won't put forth as original that which can be only a restatement of the arguments and conclusions of his predecessors.—Ed. T. S.]

Not Ashamed to Stand Up for Jesus.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., July 10, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: You ask why I use the term "so-called Christianity." I have fallen into the habit of using that expression for the reason, I reckon, that it tantalizes the Christians and provokes investigation. Nothing makes a churchman so mad as to dub him a "so-called Christian," or a "so-called follower of Jesus." The truth is, they follow Jesus as the old woman kept tavern. Like h—l!

Jesus was an iconoclast and directed the most of his energies to the tearing down of the orthodox religion of his day. He always kept a barrel of the bitterest invective on tap to pour out upon "the church" and upon the heads of the sanctified pirates who run it. He "had it in" for the "whole shootin' match," and never neglected an opportunity to uncork the vials of his wrath.

Those who to-day are fighting the church, its creeds, its fetishism, its hypocrisy, and its diabolical intolerance, are the real followers of Jesus. He belongs to us fellows of the broad church of humanity and not to the form- and creed-worshiping idolaters and bigots of the narrow church built by Paul and Constantine. Were he to come on earth and repeat his merciless arraignment of that organized fraud and humbug known as "the church," it would again crucify him, unless the Infidels rallied to his defense and beat the bloodhounds off, which they would be pretty apt to do.

Thirty-one years ago I read, and have since twice re-read, Renan's "Life of Jesus," and I confess to a good deal of sympathy and admiration, if nothing worse, for that unfortunate victim of church malignity. (For I have felt her claws a little myself.)

I might as well make a clean breast of it, I suppose, and own up that "I love Jesus, yes, I do," and Robert Ingersoll and Thomas Paine and all the other good Infidels who have drawn the fire of Satan's churchly hosts. If no one else in THE TRUTH SEEKER family will "stand up for Jesus," blessed if I don't.

S. R. SHEPHERD.

[We are much more inclined to agree with Joseph Symes, of the Melbourne Liberator, in his estimate of Jesus, than we are with the estimate which Brother Shepherd puts on the same quite possibly mythical individual. As Mr. Symes says, "the boasted character of Jesus is all the invention of his worshipers." Mr. Shepherd respects an ideal Jesus, not the Jesus of the gospels. We hate to think that our Leavenworth friend does not read every word in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but we do not see how he could talk about Jesus as he does if he had carefully perused the series of articles in examination of the Sermon on the Mount contributed to these columns some months ago by Mr. C. B. Cooper. That shows how very little there is upon which to base the extravagant claims made for the wisdom and character of the Nazarene by Renan and other sentimentalists who have allowed their preconceptions to dull their critical faculties. Renan was trained for the priesthood, which fact caused Friedrich Nietzsche to utter his famous epigram that he represented "the loss of Reason through original sin." It is true that Jesus had a large reservoir of invective constantly on tap, but we do not see that that is particularly to his credit, while cool reasoning was as conspicuous by its absence as the abuse was by its presence. As to Paul, he was indeed a bigot, and yet some of his utterances are far more broadly liberal than any attributed to Jesus. While he wanted the unbeliever cursed he strongly denounced Sabbatarianism and the sumptuary notions of the pious meddlers of his time.

The Shadow of Death.

JELICO, TENN., June 29, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find 25c., for which please send me one copy of Paine's "Age of Reason." I send for this for a friend of mine. Although I am down financially, I will not cease to agitate for the cause of Freethought and liberty.

Recently I had the sad misfortune to lose my loving wife. Words cannot describe my affliction. She died as she had lived, a consistent Agnostic. When some of her Christian friends visited her at her death-bed they thought they saw an opportunity to say something to her about the future prospects of her soul. She kindly said to them: "I am no hypocrite. I am not a Christian and not a believer in your Bible." That ended the matter. We had some very good friends among the church people, and I must say they showed every respect due us. A Baptist minister addressed the people at the grave by my request. I had told him to speak of her as a friend and neighbor, and not as a Christian, for neither of us was a believer in the creed. He did as requested, and made a very appropriate address. He spoke of the life we lived as good neighbors, a loving wife and kind husband, but did not refer to our unbelief. Of course I cannot say, "O Lord, thy will be done," for it seemed so cruel to take her away whom I loved so dearly. Yet I know I am helpless, and must, as others have done, resign myself to the demand of Mother Nature. But oh, I feel the loss of her companionship, and mourn and sigh. If I raise my voice to heaven, it seems that it is only an appeal to vacuity. Yet there may be an all-powerful God ruling the universe and directing the course of the stars. But if there is, I am unable to discover his love for man, for he remorselessly breaks the dearest ties that mortals know, and at the same time hides behind the mysteries of an unknown future all that is near and dear to us.

The closing of the eyes in death may be the unfolding of the spirit's wings to soar to worlds to us now unknown. It may be that we will then see what our mission has been on earth. But to say so is all speculation, and only a waste of words. Then let me cease to talk, let me close my mouth and cease to utter words with my tongue in the presence of death. Much as I may desire to know that she whom I loved is still alive and waiting for me in another world, my desire will not make it true. I will have to wait only till the summons comes to me; then I will know or will cease to know forever; then there will be a conscious awakening or unconscious sleep forever.

S. P. HERRON.

Christianity the Child of Older Faiths.

JANESVILLE, WIS., June 30, M. M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: I have read with much interest Mr. George MacDonald's comment, in his Observations, on my article of a fortnight previous. He does not seem to attach the same importance that I do to astro-theology as an explanation of modern religious ideas, but I am inclined to think he would do so if he had given the matter as much serious consideration.

His citing of Huxley's opinion concerning the "Diegesis" has no weight with me, as I do not consider Huxley competent to speak authoritatively upon the subject. We are too prone to forget that a man's pre-eminence and profound learning in a special field of knowledge does not fit him to speak authoritatively concerning another and totally different branch of knowledge, with which he has but the slightest acquaintance. Much as I admire Huxley and revere his learning, and hear with regret the news of his death, I cannot consider him competent to criticize Taylor. He certainly lacked Taylor's moral courage at the beginning of his career, and did not dare attack the cosmogony of Genesis, but directed his batteries against Milton's great poem, trusting that folks would perceive that he was slyly aiming at the Bible.

I cannot but feel resentment at any flip-pant disparagement of the "Diegesis;" it is a marvelous work, and, considering the early day at which it was written, wonderfully correct and exact in its statements. Comparativ religion and mythology, anthropology, and studies in folk lore were then in their infancy or not yet existent. Huxley in that day would probably have remained silent, but Taylor, a brave and most profoundly learned man in this special field of knowledge, gave us his wonderful books.

The disparagement and contempt, or, more often, the utter ignorance, of the average conventional scholar concerning such subjects as astro-theology, phallicism, and serpent worship, is the natural result of the insidious and false educational influences to which he has been subjected. The whole Christian world is leagued together to seek to minimize and underrate the importance of such studies. Concerning astro-theology, the priestly class sustain a significant, never-broken silence; yet no other class of men are so thoroughly aware of its truth and importance.

One thing is certain, if we are ever to understand the past, we must throw aside, once and for all, the theory that religion has its origin in lies and inventions. Human nature has never been such a stick as to be so completely gulled as such a theory implies. Many men are conscious of this, and cling to the orthodox systems of faith simply because they believe there must be something in them, or they could not have come into existence.

We can assist them to the light and confound the religionists by showing them what this something is, by revealing the true origin of these systems, and explaining their real meanings and their development in a way which can be comprehended by the common people. We must throw aside the idea that priests have been a weak and silly class of men, or that they have all been knaves and liars. Religious systems are an evolutionary growth, just as man is an evolutionary growth, and were molded and fashioned into their present form through the action of well-defined laws.

I can assure Mr. Macdonald that there is a deeper significance to sex worship than can be found in crosses, buns, and doughnuts. The chief stumbling-block in the way of a correct understanding of these matters has been the fact that most writers were prone to make a hobby of a favorite subject, and to seek to find traces of it everywhere, to the exclusion of everything else. The picture they draw lacks perspective, and ignores all surrounding conditions, relations, and modifications. Now, the truth is, astro-theology, phallicism, serpent worship, fire worship, Sabianism, and Scatologic rites, are simply different phases of the same thing, and no just comprehension of their real significance can be obtained except by the comparative method of study. Taken separately, they are little more than a matter of curious interest for the antiquary, but studied comparatively they afford a world of new light as to the origin and development of our modern systems of religion. Such study immediately reveals the fact that Christianity is not something new and different from what preceded it, but is the legitimate and logical development of the religious past.

Even Liberals are, as a class, too much infected with the delusion that Christianity is something new and different from what preceded it, and that it sprang up in opposition to the older systems and overthrew them. Nothing could be further from the truth; essentially, it is the same as the older systems.

Mr. Macdonald's objection that the astronomical theory does not provide for the doctrines and precepts is not well made. In the nature of the case, it does not and has no reason so to do. These are the results of social conditions. Just as no social organization, be it ever so primitive, can exist long without some sort of a written or unwritten code of laws and customs, so no system of religion, be it based on astronomical phenomena or not, can long exist without forming some sort of a moral code, and by this we are enabled, to a greater or less extent, to comprehend its historic relations, to understand the conditions under which the system originated and developed, and to settle approximately the time of its origin.

Certainly, as Mr. Macdonald suggests, no sane person would accuse the solar orb of preaching the Sermon on the Mount or dictating the Ten Commandments, regarding it, as we do at present, simply as the solar orb, and as something totally devoid of intelligence, or consciousness, or power of expression. But we must remember that the ancients did not so regard it, but, on the contrary, believed it to be a living and beneficent intelligence, who showered his good gifts and blessings on man, bestowing life, light, and warmth, and the products of the harvest time on mankind, and who lived by eating the stars, for it was his round stomach full of them that men saw in the heavens.

Conceiving the sun as such a being, it was but natural that he should also confer upon man the blessings of religious instruction in some such form as the Sermon on the Mount, or the Ten Commandments, or the Levitical code. Right here it is that we see the subtle influence of the priesthood, seeking to claim such commands as the teachings of the sun-god as would redound to their own best interests and influence.

Nothing can be more foolish or fallacious than to assert that the sources of religious systems are to be found in the inventive and lying faculties of priests. Such an hypothesis not only does not, but is utterly inadequate, to account for the facts. All modern research shows that a far greater and more adequate cause is necessary to explain the origin and development of religious systems; not but what priestly invention is an important element, which must be kept constantly in mind and taken into account, but always only as a minor factor, never as the controlling or originating influence. Priestcraft simply labors to transform, as much as lies in its power, already existing material to suit its own purposes; it does not invent or originate the material it uses.

The present is always and inevitably the child of the past, and no set of men, no matter how great their influence and authority, can any more avert or prevent the action of causes which involve religious systems and ideas than they can check or stop the growth and development of the human species. The influences at work are too deeply rooted in the past.

In Christianity, I am convinced, we have a religion in which priestly power has done all that it could do in the line of deception, and yet what, and what only, could it and did it accomplish? The intrinsic and basic ideas and principles of the older systems on which it was founded it could not, and did not, change, but what it did was this: It took sun-worship out of the sky, and localized it in Palestine; it sought to tear away and destroy every ligament and association that bound it to the past, and foisted it on the world as a new revelation from on high. This they accomplished, and in doing so perpetrated a great wrong, for they changed that which was natural and beautiful and inspiring into that which was unnatural and hideous, yet in every other essential to-day Christianity is still the venerable religion of the sun, and we have but to take Christ out of Palestine and put him back into the heavens where he belongs to perceive this. Through the study of astro-theology, phallicism, and their kindred themes we can explain to men why and how this is so, and free them from the fetters of superstition, and we can never do it in any other way.

Mr. Macdonald says he does not believe that the inventors or adapters of Christian theology knew enough about astronomy to adapt their yarns to it. They did not have to; the yarns had already been in existence for ages, and the astronomical portions of their systems had always been the chief concern of the priesthoods. Without a profound knowledge of the movements of the heavenly bodies, they could not correctly conduct their religious festivals. The correctness of their calendar was a matter of the most serious importance to them. In Egypt, at the present day, we may see on every side vast temples, which have been shifted on their bases, given a twist, so to speak, or often practically rebuilt, at a vast expense of labor, to correct their orientation, which the precession of the equinoxes rendered incorrect every 300 years.

I believe that these priests, driven out of Egypt some 500 years ago, when the Turks rose into power in the Mohammedan world, were the founders of the system we now call Christianity.

I have no faith in the generally-accepted opinion that the system is 1,800 years old, and originated in the manner it is claimed to have done, but believe, with Professors Johnson and Bellairs, that it is of comparatively modern origin.

Mortuary—Eola Kaple.

"Died, on Monday, June 17th, at Jersey City, Mrs. Eola Griffin Kaple, aged forty-two years. Mrs. Kaple had been an invalid for the past several years, and her mission to Jersey City was to seek a change of climate with a view of regaining her health. The remains were brought to Middlefield, New York, and the funeral services, which were wholly secular, took place under the shade of the maples in the Middlefield cemetery in the presence of a large concourse of friends and relatives. By a special agreement made some time ago, Orin L. Tipple delivered the address, and Mrs. Fred E. Page sang a hymn from the Cosmian Hymn-book. Mrs. Kaple was the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Agnes Griffin, of Middlefield. Besides her husband and parents she leaves two sisters, Mamie and Belle, and one brother, Curtis, to mourn her death. Mrs. Kaple was a lady of rare mental attainments; she was a pioneer in the progressive thought of her time. She was conversant with all the literature of the day; she was a careful and conscientious student of nature, and her brain was a store-house of valuable information upon the history of the past and the current topics of the day. She was an accomplished musician, a loving and dutiful wife, a good neighbor, and true to her friends. She will be missed by all who had the pleasure of her acquaintance. 'Tis a long, last, and beautiful sleep, and under the seven-hued arch of hope let the dead rest.'"

MRS. GLENDEEN SHEARMAN AIKIN.

On June 19, 1895, at Corydon, Warren Co., Penn., departed into the unknown Mrs. Glendeen Shearman Aikin, in her thirty-ninth year. It is only a few short years since Mrs. Aikin, in the full bloom of a splendid physique, bid fair to live to an advanced age, but that dread destroyer, consumption, which medical science as yet is unable to successfully combat, shortened her fleeting years to less than two score, death claiming her just as she was beginning fairly to realize the truer purposes of life.

I have made the remark a thousand times, and must still reiterate it, that if women would only withdraw their powerful influence from the church, ten years would see it crumbling into fragments, and its finality within the next quarter of a century. If all women were like my relative, such would soon be the fate of churches and creeds.

Mrs. Aikin was one of those independent, thinking, progressive women who had no desire for Epworth Leagues, Women's Christian Temperance Union societies, or Foreign Missionary assemblages. Her endeavors and labors were confined to making her own home enjoyable; and if she encountered want or heard of it, she made haste right then and there to minister thereto in the most direct way, so that hunger was appeased from her own table, and nakedness covered from her own wardrobe.

She was a friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER, an admirer of Ingersoll, and a reader of Helen Gardener's works, and urged very strongly, and I think with success, that the "Struthers Library," of Warren, Pa., should put them on its shelves.

She had no fear of death—only regret that she must leave her husband, her daughter, and her son. She had pondered on the future, and although keenly realizing its inevitable trend as to "whence and whither," was perfectly resigned to accept its conditions whatever they might be.

During her protracted illness she was kindly remembered by the resident Methodist clergyman, who, in the pursuit of his duties, felt called upon to visit her. She told him plainly and calmly she had no use for his creed, as her mind had long been made up as to death and futurity.

Her spirited bearing, generous impulses, and laudable aspirations will long be remembered by her sorrowing friends, and many the heartfelt regrets that her days were so few in the land of her nativity.

Eneas Scott.

Eneas Scott, one of the oldest residents of Morgan county, Ill., died June 24, 1895, at his home four miles west of Franklin. Had he lived one more day he would have fulfilled his eighty-second year. He was born June 25, 1813, at Barrington, Somersetshire, England, his parents, Jonas and Catharine Scott, being natives of that shire. In 1817 the family emigrated to America, spending four weeks on the voyage, and landing at New York city on November 3. Thence they proceeded to New Jersey, and settled on a farm about fifteen miles from the metropolis. The parents were afterwards laid to rest in Newark cemetery, the father dying Feb. 23, 1848, and the mother July 6, 1856. The family comprised four children, viz., Ase-nath, Eneas, Charles, and Jonas, of whom Jonas, now of Jacksonville, Illinois, still survives. Eneas lived in New Jersey until he reached manhood, marrying before he left the state, and soon afterward moved to Springfield, Ill., where two children were born, and where the wife, surviving but a short time, died. Only one of the children born of this marriage is now living. Eneas returned to New Jersey, and was married again, a little later removing to Cincinnati, O., where for ten years he was foreman in Greenwood's foundry, and from which city he removed a second time to Illinois, settling on the farm where he died. By the second marriage there were eight children born, five of whom survive the father, and the aged wife, who for fifty-four years has held to his hand with womanly devotion, is left to follow toward the unknown and silent future. Mr. Scott presented to the world, and impressed upon all about him, the sterling characteristics of a constant and indefatigable worker (industry was to him a supreme virtue), an exact and prompt manager, and a fearless thinker. How much the young men of this generation owe to those industrious, tireless, sturdy pioneers who, years ago, when our Western country was a wilderness, came here and undertook the task—and succeeded in it too—of turning that wilderness into a very garden of plenty and delight, can scarcely be measured in words. On questions concerning the future, Mr. Scott was Agnostic, always a Freethinker, and for fifty years a reader of the Investigator, and for many years, also, of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He desired a secular funeral, and while all members of the family were not in sympathy with his Liberal views, yet all agreed to honor the father's memory and justify his faithfulness to his conception of what he believed to be truth, by arranging for such a service. In accordance with that agreement, the writer officiated as speaker. The address was delivered at the house, beginning with the reading of Bryant's noble poem, "Thanatopsis," and briefly calling attention to the animating purpose of the life just closed, its lessons, its usefulness, and the certainty that whatever the future may hold for such as he, as he himself expressed it to his son, "all is well." Mr. Scott was laid to rest in Diamond Hill cemetery, Jacksonville, Ill., the Masons performing the final ceremonies at the grave.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Tommy's Kindling.

"Will my dear bring his mamma some kindling
Right now? for I've something to bake—
Something good, and we'll have it for dinner;
It might be a big ginger cake."

"Es, I'll bring oo a load in my 'aggon,"
And away in a twinkling he sped;
But the wagon was set for a horse power,
So he started in search of his sled.

But the calves in the orchard were racing,
So, tying the sled to the bars,
For an hour he made one in the frolic,
And then with the baby played cars.

Asleep he was carried from dinner,
But the nap was a short one, and then
Round a tortoise and toad in the garden
He built a commodious pen;

After that dug a well with the penknife
His uncle had sent him from town;
Then chased all the cats up the maples,
And waited to see them come down.

That evening, when twilight was falling,
A sled clattered up to the door,
And a wee, tired boy was unloading
Five green little chips, and no more.

Science Lesson.

INSECTS.

The sunshine of the summer day brings myriads of insects into life. Those gifted with language utter all the sounds they can. The air is vocal with their hum and song. Life is afloat and abloom every where. The meadow grass teems with jubilant life, while both forest and field are tremulous with the swish and sway of numberless notes of curious little forms of breathing, eager, and earnest life. They are, these little creatures, so delicately and, withal, so wonderfully made, that it is worth anyone's while to observe and study their nature and characteristics. We get the word insect direct from the Latin, and it means notched or out into, thus indicating the cross-lines or sections, marking the body of the creature called an insect. The brain is small, but it is there, just the same, as in the head of an elephant or horse. Instead of a backbone, however, there is a sort of knotted cord which answers every purpose, from which, and from the brain, extend numerous white threads or nerves. There are no lungs, but in place of lungs are long air-pipes, by which air goes to every part of the body. They do not, however, breathe by the mouth, but by the nine small holes or spiracles along either side of the body. And some water-insects breathe by means of gills. They possess a tube-like heart, with partitions and valves. True, they have no red blood to circulate in arteries and veins. Yet there is a colorless fluid that serves the same purpose as blood, moves through the body and mingles with nutritive elements, receiving air from the air-pipes, which renders it all right to renew, nourish, and sustain life. There is no spontaneous generation among insects, but they come from eggs. And the unerring instinct of mother-insects causes them to lay their eggs near a plentiful supply of food so their young can help themselves as soon as they are born.

There is no need of soaring to unknown heights in search of new subjects, while the common forms of life at our very feet are so numerous and so little understood.

The wonderful and the beautiful are all around us. We walk blindfold amid a world of beauty, a world of teeming, sentient life. Our feet tread on leaves of undeciphered knowledge. Our eyes look, but see not the vast panorama of science before us, or we are blinded by the glorious visions of loveliness on either hand.

Our ears are dulled to the music of the procession of organic life, and so we go groping on our way.

We should turn to the contemplation of that which is all about us, and know that nothing is beneath our observation and investigation.

As we learn of the swarming, seething life on every hand, its perfect adaptation to its environment, its attributes and qualities, its delicate adjustment, we shall think less of the I and more of its companions and relatives, each filling their part and doing their work in the great circle of throbbing, moving, never-ending life.

Story of a Hundred Dollar Bill.

A distinguished statesman forty years ago was on a visit to Baltimore, and he gave to a colored servant girl while there what he supposed to be at the time a one dollar bill. The girl went to a grocery store, and after making a few trifling purchases, gave the bill in payment, under the supposition that it was a dollar. The proprietor of the store, a highly esteemed citizen of Baltimore, noticed with surprise that it was for a hundred dollars, and he supposed at once that the woman had stolen it. Ascertaining the delusion the girl was under, he informed her of the true character of the note, and told her he would detain it until the owner was found. He advertised the bill, and the statesman, in answer, called to say that the girl's story was true; and that as her honesty had been suspected she should keep the bill. He then departed to the scenes of his daily triumphs, and in the acquisition of a great fame perhaps forgot the incident. The grocery merchant retained the note, in expectation of the girl returning, but she never called for it, it is supposed being frightened and fearing to be charged with its theft. Years rolled on and she married, bore children and died, and a few years ago a son applied to the merchant for the note and the interest, which now amounted to a large sum of money. This amount the custodians of the fund paid into one of our city courts, in order that the court should decide whether or not the claimant was entitled to it. The court sustained the claim, and the money was paid to the heir, and thus ends the true story of a hundred dollar bill.

About Cowards.

Here is a little talk between a boy who is a great hunter for his age and a lady of his acquaintance, which shows that cowardice sometimes depends upon the way things are looked at.

"A rabbit," said the young hunter, "is the most awful coward that there is in the world. My! How he does run from a hunter!"

"So you think the rabbit is a coward, eh?"

"Why, of course."

"Well, let us 'suppose a little.' Suppose you were about six or eight inches tall?"

"Well?"

"And had good, strong, swift legs?"

"Yes?"

"And didn't have any gun, and a great, big fellow came after you, who did have one. What would you do?"

"What should I do? I should streak it like lightning."

"I think you would, and I think, too, that you would have your own ideas as to who was the coward."

Correspondence.

LEE, N. DAK., July 8, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It is such a long time since I wrote to you that I am afraid you have forgotten me, but I will not wait so long between my next letters. Isn't it funny about George Washington that he died in the last hour of the last day of the last week of the last month of the last year of the last century?

I think that if there is a God he is a most cruel person. If he has almighty power why doesn't he make people good, and not have a hell or devil? Now, if some one is murdered, they often take the wrong man and hang him, and God lets them do it.

My teacher in Jamestown was a Christian, and gave us poetry to learn. I will write a stanza of the poem she gave me: Heaven is not reached at a single bound, But we build the ladder by which we rise, From the lowly earth to the vaulted skies, And we mount to its summit round by round.

As my letter is getting long I will close. If any Freethinking boys or girls over twelve years and under seventeen years will write to me I will answer.

Your little infidel,

NELLIE G. BUKKE,
Aged thirteen years.

I inclose a piece of poetry which I composed.

SUSIE'S LETTER.

My dear, dear mamma,
A letter here you'll find,
And in it I am sure you'll see
Mistakes of every kind.

I am going to write and tell you
How Robbie and I play,
But sometimes Rob gets angry,
Then angry words he'll say.

Dear mamma, I am lonesome,
And always, when I roam
Out in the fields and meadows,
I'm thinking most of home.

Now, dear mamma, I'm tired,
And Auntie's calling, too,
So good-by, and answer soon
To your loving little Sue.

[It is always a pleasure to hear from a thoughtful and intelligent girl like Nellie. There is a little mistake about the time of the death of George Washington. He died on the 14th of December, 1799. His last words were, "It is well."—ED. C. C.]

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

THE BRAIN AND BIBLE; OR THE CONFLICT BETWEEN MENTAL SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY. By EDGAR C. BEALL, M.D., with a preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

This is the only work of its kind in the literature of Freethought. Its arguments are based upon scientific phrenology, and appeal directly to the reader's sense of logic and love of justice. It is eloquent as well as convincing. Price, cloth, $1. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving from the Census of 1890 the value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories, and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of special interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures. This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustices of church exemption is suffered to exist. By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made: Ten copies..... $1.00 Fifty copies..... 4.50 One hundred copies..... 8.00 Larger quantities at special rates. 400 Years OF Freethought

By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pp., Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. $5.

With The Truth Seeker for One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES.

A new edition of that splendid prose poem "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt boveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

LULU, who has been very ill, and suddenly awakens: "Am I in heaven mamma?" Mother: "No, dear, we are still with you."—Tammany Times.

"I HEAR that your congregation intends to pray for rain," said a man to a member of the Quokosh Methodist church. "Well," was the reply, "we have decided to wait twenty-four hours more before proceeding to extreme measures."—Life.

"WELL, Jimmie, how much did you put in the Sunday-school box to-day?" "Ten cents," said Jimmie. "It was good business, too. Teacher gave me a card for being the most generous boy in the class, and I swapped it off for a postage stamp worth fifteen cents with Billie Wilkins."—Harper's Bazaar.

MINISTER, making parochial call, interviews our youngest, seated on his knee: "Well, my little man, do you go to Sunday-school?" "No, sir, but I say my prayers." "Ah, indeed? That's good. Whom do you pray to?" "I don't 'member the gentleman's name, but he lives 'hind the moon."—Judge.

THE VISITOR: "I gather that the Baptists and Methodists are not on the best of terms here." The Native: "You bet they ain't. You see, mister, doorin' the dry spell the Baptists allowed they would give a picnic to break the drouth. As soon as the Methodists heard of that, they begun prayin' for rain, an' when it rained on the day of the picnic they tuk and claimed all the credit."—Cincinnati Tribune.

GOOD LADY: "Now, little boy, who made you?" First kinky-headed boy, with a charming, toothy smile: "Dunno'm." Lady: "God made you, child." First boy: "Yes'm." Lady, to second boy: "Who was the meekest man?" Second boy: "Donno'm." Lady: "Why, Moses! Moses was the meekest man. You must really try to remember, Moses, for I shall ask you again." Second boy: "Yes'm." Lady, to third boy: "Who was the strongest man?" Third boy: "Dunno'm." Lady: "Why, I told you last Sunday! Samson! Samson!" Third boy: "Yes'm." Lady, recapitulating: "Now, tell me who made you?" Second boy: "Moses." Lady, in despair: "Oh, no! no!" Second boy: "Yes'm; Moses did make me. Dat ar boy what Gord made, he has gone to git er drink."—Puck.

THE WORLD-REFORMER AND HIS WIFE.

Said Farmer John to Joiner Ned: "Come put a back door on my shed."

Says Joiner Ned to Farmer John: "I cannot put your back door on. The guild I'm interested in for the abolishment of sin meets at my house this very day, and so I cannot get away."

"Well, after you've abolished sin come down to-morrow and begin; I want that back door in my shed," said Farmer John to Joiner Ned.

"To-morrow, neither, can I come, The Friends of the Millennium meet at the house of Deacon Kent, and I am first vice-president."

"Well, then, next Wednesday, without doubt,

When your millennium's started out. Just let it take its course and spread; And put that back door on my shed."

"I read an essay Wednesday, John, Before the Culture Club, upon 'The Easiest Method to Restore Our Long-Lost Eden Here Once More; To foster peace, abolish war, And render virtue popular.'"

"Well, get your Eden here all right By sundown, prompt, next Wednesday night;

And then, next Thursday morning, Ned, Come put that back door on my shed."

"The Anti-Hunger Club convenes Next Thursday, down to Hiram Green's, And I have promised to orate On how to crush and extirpate Man's tendency for fish and meat, His grovelling desire to eat."

"But won't you come down, by and by, We'll say two years from next July? You'll have your various schemes put through, You'll have the universe built new; Come down, then, with your tool-kit, Ned, And put that back door on my shed."

"I think," says Ned, "I'll take that chance

If you will pay me in advance; For my wife says that we've no meat And no flour in the house to eat; This cash may save domestic strife And kind of pacify my wife."

—Sam Walter Foss.

DID MAN FALL? Is the Garden of Eden a Fact? Israel W. Groh.

EPIDEMIC DELUSIONS. A Lecture by Frederic R. Marvin, M.D. Giving reasonable reasons for Religious and other Delusions.

FALSE CLAIMS OF THE CHURCH. John E. Remsburg's most noted work, and one of the most effective ever written by any Freethinker.

FIRST EPISTLE OF BENNETT THE APOSTLE TO THE TRUTH SEEKERS.

Written while journeying in and near the land of Yahweh. Containing the best moral instructions of the world from the great teachers of the former ages. D. M. Bennett.

THE GIANT DELUSION. A paper read before the Freethought International Congress at Chicago. One of Otto Wettstein's fraternal attacks on Spiritualism.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY. To which is added a poem on Thomas Paine. One of Samuel P. Putnam's most brilliant lectures. Every Christian who asks the idiotic question, "What Has Infidelity Done?" should be induced to read this book, if he has to be paid to do it.

HOW CAN WE BE SAVED? Was Jesus Supernaturally Conceived, and did he Rise from the Dead? Israel W. Groh.

INGERSOLL AND JESUS. Showing how the two agree. A poem by Samuel P. Putnam.

THE LIMITATIONS OF TOLERATION.

A discussion between Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic R. Conder, Ex-Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, before the Nineteenth Century Club of New York. "Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him." Colonel Ingersoll maintains this, the others deny it. Mr. Conder is a Roman Catholic, Mr. Woodford a Protestant.

MATERIALISM: Its History, and Its Influence Upon Society. Dr. Louis Buchner.

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE WORKERS. A consideration of the Marvels and Miracles of the New Testament. One of John Peck's best books.

MOSES BEFORE THE COURT, or The Forgery of the Old Testament. Dedicated to the Clergy. H. J. Seignuret, M.D.

THE NEW GOD. "It is an open secret that man has always made his Gods. They exist in and through him, as the image exists in and through the mirror. Take away man and you take away God—the image vanishes." This pamphlet, therefore, is a consideration of what kind of a God man should make. Samuel P. Putnam.

ORTHODOXY. A lecture by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and one of that great man's best. The subjects considered are: Orthodox Religion Dying Out, Religious Deaths and Births, The Religion of Reciprocity, Mohammed, The Destruction of Art, The Discovery of America, Copernicus and Kepler, Charles Darwin, Special Providence, The Latest Creed, God as a Governor, The Love of God, The Fall of Man, The Atonement, The Second Birth, Inspiration, The Reign of Truth and Love, The Wars It Brought, The Resurrection, The Judgment-Day, Pious Evasions, "No Bible, No Civilization," Miracles of the New Testament, The Ascension, Casting out Devils, Necessity of Belief, Eternal Punishment, Some Who Are Damned, What I Believe, Immortality. This lecture is on the famous text, "The Clergy know that I know that they do not know."

PERSONAL EXISTENCE AFTER DEATH IMPROBABLE. L. R. Smith.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS MASS MEETING AT LINCOLN HALL, WASHINGTON. Being the Speeches of Hon. FREDERICK DOUGLASS and Col. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL on the Decision of the United States Court that the Civil Rights Act is Unconstitutional. Fifty-three large octavo pages, of which Colonel Ingersoll's speech occupies 33 pages.

PULPIT, PEW, AND CRADLE. So long as the Pulpit speaks to believing Pews composed chiefly of mothers, the cradle will be rocked by ghosts and the race will remain on its knees to a devil of its own creation and to a God who is powerless against him. One of Helen Gardner's brightest efforts.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY BETTER THAN ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. M. Babcock.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS. One of L. K. Washburn's best lectures, and it is, like all of his, very good.

THE ROARING LION ON THE TRACK. One of M. Babcock's comical sermons.

SCIENCE vs. RELIGION, or The Conflict Between Reason and Superstition. T. C. Widdicombe.

ST. MATTHEW BEFORE THE COURT. Presenting the evidence of the forgery of his alleged gospel. H. J. Seignuret.

SISTER LUCY AND HER AWFUL DISCLOSURES REGARDING NEW HALL CONVENT. Showing that Convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom.

SPIRITUALISM FROM A MATERIALISTIC STANDPOINT. B. F. Underwood. Written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK. Torture Implements Employed in the 15th and 16th centuries for the promulgation of Christianity. Being the Nuremberg Collection, with specimens from the Holy Inquisition. 23 pictures. The descriptions and reflections by George E. Macdonald.

VICTOR HUGO'S ORATION ON VOLTAIRE, delivered on the one hundredth anniversary of Voltaire's death. Translated by James Parton, author of the Life of Voltaire. To which are added the three great poems of Goethe, George Eliot, and Longfellow.

WAS CHRIST CRUCIFIED? Anstin Bierbower. A lawyer's consideration of the evidence of that alleged event.

WAS JESUS INSANE? A consideration of Christ's alleged acts which would lead one to that conclusion. F. K. Washburn.

WHY DON'T HE LEND A HAND? And other Agnostic Poems. Samuel P. Putnam. The title poem is perhaps the most popular of Mr. Putnam's many poems, and a great many editions of it have been called for. The other poems are: The Golden Age, The Ideal and the Real, Not Dead, but Living, Fruition, Hope, Thomas Paine, Nature's Gospel, Address to Deity, and the short poem so often recited with great effect by Charles Watts, Give Us Light.

WILL THE COMING MAN WORSHIP GOD? B. F. Underwood; written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

WOMAN: FOUR CENTURIES OF PROGRESS. A lecture delivered at the Freethinkers' International Congress at Chicago. Considered: The Cause of Woman's Subjugation, The Canon Law and Its Effects Upon Her, Theology Never Helpful to Woman, Invention Woman's Friend, Freethought the Benefactor of Woman. Susan H. Wilson.

Gems of Thought.

THE consolation of life is to say out what one thinks.—Voltaire.

HE that tilleth his land shall hav plenty of bread; but he that followeth after vain persons shall hav poverty enough.—Galveston News.

WHO shall subjugate the spirit to the prison-walls of a sect? Cut off wings and feet and lie a useless body under lock and key of authority?—Horace L. Traubel.

LOSING the simple customs of our ancestors, we multiply laws and magistrates; confessing our corruption by the very remedies we employ for its correction.—Phocian.

IGNORANCE and fear generate and nourish superstition. By how much the more anyone's mind is weak and unenlightened, by so much the stronger will superstitious influence be found to hav on it.—J. L. Mosheim.

MORAL feeling is a force—a force by which men's actions are to be restrained within certain bounds, and no legislative mechanism can really increase its results. By how much this force is deficient, by so much must its work remain undone.—Herbert Spencer.

THOUGHTS that great hearts once broke for, we Breathe cheaply in the common air; The dust we trample heedlessly Throbb'd once in saints and heroes rare, Who perished, opening for their race New pathways to the commonplace.

—Lowell.

I AM the means; they do degrade me most Who make of me the end of life's desire; I do interpret beauty, but am not That beauty's self; I ever bend to hear Divine imagination's high commands, Obeying that which is immutable. They serve me best whose gaze transcends my law, And know me least who wear me as a gyve. I am the living God of little men— The tool of great men I.

—Francis Howard Williams.

"POLITICS," he [Maxime Du Camp] once remarked, "gives back its adepts exhausted, humiliated, and despairing, when there is no further use for them." Politics, as Guizot has said, is a repulsive and wicked evil. To play at politics skilfully, it is necessary to get rid of every conviction, for conviction is by its nature an impeding luggage, which makes marching difficult, and may prevent the exercise of political acrobatics and wire-dancing.—Francis Xavier Kraus.

SUPERFICIAL thinkers confuse the idea of order with that of design. That there is order in Nature, no one will deny, but order does not necessarily imply design. Order will always be observed where more than one thing exists; indeed, more than one thing cannot exist without it. The state of relativity between different existences is a necessary one. That order in some existences is designed, as in the mechanism of a watch or an engine, will be admitted, but that design is necessarily back of all order, is certainly untrue.—Independent Pulpit.

SUPPOSE the medical society should refuse to give us an anodyne or set a broken limb, until we had signed our belief in a certain number of propositions, of which, we will say, this is the first: "(1) All men's teeth are naturally in a state of total decay, and therefore no man can bite until every one of them is extracted and a new set inserted, according to the principles of dentistry adopted by this Society." Of course, those doctors would have a right to say we shan't hav any rhubarb if we don't sign these articles. . . . but then to ask a fellow not to discuss their propositions before he signs them is what I should call boiling it down a little too strong.—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

VOLTAIRE began to think, to doubt, to inquire. He studied the history of the church, of the creed. He found that the religion of his time rested on the inspiration of the scriptures—the infallibility of the church—the dreams of insane hermits—the absurdities of the Fathers—the mistakes and falsehoods of saints—the hysteria of nuns—the cunning of priests and the stupidity of the people. He found that the Emperor Constantine, who lifted Christianity into power, murdered his wife Fausta and his eldest son Crispus, the same year that he convened the Council of Nice, to decide whether Christ was a man or the son of God. The Council decided, in the year 325, that Christ was consubstantial with the Father. He found that the church was indebted to a husband who assassinated his wife, a father who murdered his son, for settling the vexed question of the divinity of the savior.—Ingersoll.

A most extraordinary publication: We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

A common-sense exposure of the error in the reasoning upon which is based the belief in a "Creation" or "First Cause" of things.

"This volume discusses the question of a creator with such plainness of wording that even the unlearned can understand, and approaches it from so many different directions that it is one of the most comprehensive and conclusive works on the subject we remember seeing."—THE TRUTH SEEKER, July 22, 1893.

A small farm of 10 acres 86 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes walk of the railroad station, 9 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes walk.

The place is specially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1,000 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest, overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

THE PLACE CAN BE BOUGHT FOR $3,500.

Catarrh Cannot Be Cured

with LOCAL APPLICATIONS, as they cannot reach the seat of the disease. Catarrh is a blood or constitutional disease, and in order to cure it you must take internal remedies. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, and acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces. Hall's Catarrh Cure is not a quack medicine. It was prescribed by one of the best physicians in this country for years, and is a regular prescription. It is composed of the best tonics known, combined with the best blood purifiers, acting directly on the mucous surfaces. The perfect combination of the two ingredients is what produces such wonderful results in curing Catarrh. Send for testimonials, free.

News of the Week.

THE Pope has ordered three days' prayer for the conversion of England to Catholicism.

SPAIN has agreed to pay soon the $1,500,000 Mora claim due the United States government.

THE Banque de Peuple of Montreal has suspended payments for the present and great excitement prevails.

SENATOR BRICE is said to be at the head in a movement to parallel the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton railway system.

THE National Window-Glass Workers have fixed the entrance fee to their union at $500, and without membership in that union men of that trade cannot work, with the consent of the union.

THE defeat of the Liberal party in the recent election was almost a rout. Among those defeated was John Morley. On the other hand, Sir Charles Dilke was elected with scarcely any opposition.

THE elm-trees in the East are being destroyed by the ravages of insects, the moths' natural enemies, the birds, having been slaughtered by the "sportmen," and the park officials neglecting their duties.

THE mayor, aldermen, and other officials of Ansonia, Conn., planned to have a group photograph taken on Sunday. The Law and Order League threatens to arrest any photographer who opens his slides on that day.

By the collision of the steamers Ortigia and Maria P. near the mouth of the Gulf of Spezzia on July 21st, the latter was stove and sank at once, drowning 148 passengers, mostly emigrants for the River Plata.

THE Chicago Times-Herald offers prizes amounting to $5,000 in a horseless carriage contest to be run on Nov. 2d between Chicago and Milwaukee. The third and fourth prizes, $1,000 and $500, will be open to the world.

On July 16th an eight-days' debate on the currency question opened in the assembly room of the Illinois Club, Chicago. The disputants were Hon. R. G. Horr, of Michigan, and W. H. Harvey, author of "Coin's Financial School."

THE Japanese troops in Formosa have lately suffered some reverses at the hands of the Black Flags, the bandit Chinese forces who are trying to hold the Island despite its session to Japan by the terms of the treaty of Shimonoseki.

THE Fairmount Park Commissioners (Philadelphia) have now joined the appalling lengthy list of official donkeys. They have decided that promiscuous music is entirely out of place on Sunday and that hereafter at the concerts in the Park only "sacred music" can be played. At the Coney Island "sacred concerts" one's reverential emotions are stirred to solemn enthusiasm by such "long meter" hymns as "You Can't Play in My Yard," and "Jane, Jane, She Isn't Just the Same."

MRS. LELAND STANFORD offered the proceeds to accrue from the sale of 1,000 gallons of brandy from her ranch for the benefit of the Leland Stanford, Jr., University. It was to be used for medicinal purposes. The offer has raised a storm of protest from the ministers and many of the temperance people.

REUBEN F. KOLB, twice the candidate of the Populists for governor of Alabama, announces that he will not again be a candidate. He has opened a bureau to bring Western and Southern emigrants to Alabama. He is now opposed to further fusion with the Republicans, and this subject is likely to make a split in the party in Alabama.

BALLARD SMITH, the London correspondent of the New York World, referring to the defeat of the Liberal party in the parliamentary election, speaks of John Morley, the Freethinker, as "the purest, most single-minded of patriots, and perhaps the only member of the late government who was sincerely devoted to the cause of Home Rule in Ireland."

THIS is the way in which the Catholic Union and Times praises the Freethinker, John Morley: "The British Liberals have at least one honest and fearless friend of Ireland in the person of John Morley. His recent denunciation of his late colleagues for the shameful manner in which they had betrayed the cause of Ireland is not likely to be forgotten."

HOKE SMITH, Secretary of the Interior, rules that government employees at Helena, Mont., who put in claims for pay for work done on Sunday, cannot get anything. He says that Sunday is not a day for labor, and that he is not authorized to pay for work done on that day. Does Secretary Smith compel his cook and hostler to work for nothing on Sunday?

THE Cuban fight is in the same state of uncertainty as last week. The Spanish report victories on their side, and the insurgents on theirs, and real facts are almost impossible to obtain. The United States government is trying to rigorously enforce the neutrality laws, but with indifferent success, to the delight of most citizens of the country who are familiar with the methods of Spanish rule. On July 21st the cutter McLean seized, near Key West, Fla., the tug George W. Childs, on the charge of carrying filibusterers to Cuba.

At the silver conference in Chicago it was found that there was more or less difference in regard to methods between the Western and Southern delegates, the latter wishing to conduct the fight within the Democratic party, and the former insisting on non-partisan organization. A compromise resolution was adopted, and the National Silver League will issue an address to the people. Gen. A. J. Warner, president of the Bimetallic League, protested against any line of work that attempted to carry on the agitation without being allied to the League, which, he said, had hitherto done all the educational work.

On July 15th ex Prime Minister Stambuloff, of Bulgaria, was assassinated by four men who attacked him in the street. He was shot and stabbed, receiving more than twenty wounds. In raising his hands to guard his head, his wrists were nearly severed, and both hands had to be amputated. He died after four days. It is generally thought the police connived at the murder and that there may be international intrigue behind it. He was bitterly hated by Russia and the Russian party in his own country. Mr. Stambuloff was popularly known as "The Bismarck of Bulgaria."

THE Japanese have learned how to handle cholera, as appears from the statements of Dr. Eldridge, of Yokohama, who says of the cholera invasions this year: "Up to June 14th there have been 1,382 cases in Japan itself, representing, probably, the invasion of at least a hundred different localities, and yet, with the exception of certain of the military ports at which the imported cases were first received, and where it has been most successfully handled and restricted, the disease has, in every instance, been stamped out with the occurrence of the first or, at most, first half dozen cases."

BETTER WORLD

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dived into the future, far as human eyes could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

Pen Pictures of the World's Fair.

By S. P. Putnam.

It is, besides being a complete Guide-Book, the best description of the Fair yet given—poetic, beautiful, accurate. It describes the inauguration ceremonies, gives the director-general's address, the efforts to close the Fair Sundays and the triumph of the Sunday-openers; describes the various buildings and what they contain, and is, all in all, the very best picture of the Fair that can be painted with a pen.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

What a New Subscriber, Who Has Received His Pictorial Text-Book, Says of It.

LAMAR, Mo., May 8, 1895.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is received, and after a careful examination of the work I unhesitatingly pronounce it one of the most impressive Freethought works ever issued from the press. It will indeed "corner the parson" and all his flock, and I shall take great pleasure in showing the book to my orthodox friends. As a reference book it is invaluable, and it should find a place in every Freethinker's library.

Respectfully, W. F. BARRY.

When Renewing Your Subscription, Take Advantage of These Good Offers.

For $6.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and S. P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" ($5). Large Octavo, 1150 pages, gilt sides and back, marbled edges—the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press. 140 Half Tone Engravings of the Prominent Freethinkers of the past four centuries.

The object of this work is to present the Course of Freethought throughout the Civilized World from the time of Columbus and Bruno to the time of Ingersoll. It is a radical Historic Record of the greatest developments of the human race. It reveals Freethought as an intellectual, moral, literary, social, industrial, and political movement. It shows what Freethought is in itself, how manifold are its influences, and with what promise we can hail its future triumph. "FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT" embraces the most illustrious pages of human history, adorned with the brightest genius, radiant with the most splendid poetry, rich with the greatest inventions and discoveries, and ennobled with freedom's most shining advance. Nothing can be more interesting or more inspiring to the pioneer workers of to-day, to those who are still in the van for human rights and progress. No Liberal can afford to be without this book. It contains the greatest thoughts and the greatest deeds of the greatest men in one harmonious and magnificent whole, a vivid picture of man's sublimest evolution, with the added glory of woman's emancipation from the chains and slavery of a barbaric church.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.
By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers: "Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Disappearing Dogmas.

The Japanese Christians want to be independent of the American Board of Missionaries. They wish to conduct their churches and schools to suit themselves. They feel that Japan is a nation among nations, and that it is an insult to be treated as though they were savages or semi-barbarians. In this respect the Japanese Christians show a much greater spirit of independence than do the American Catholics, who seem content to remain the vassals of Rome, to permit the American Catholic church to be regarded as merely a missionary dependency of the See of Peter. Of this Japanese movement the Sun says:

"Very likely, Christianity would undergo a modification in Japan if it were left to be controlled by Japanese influences only, but its growth would be natural, and no longer artificial. It is probable that it would be affected by the disposition to skeptical inquiry which distinguishes the educated Japanese mind. Its general principles of morality, rather than its theology, would probably be propagated. But so also in Christendom is that the present tendency. The American Board is the great Congregational missionary organization, and for several years past it has been disturbed by the distrust of the old Puritan theology, which is prevalent among the Congregationalists and the Presbyterians also. Applicants for commissions as missionaries have been rejected because they had no fixed theological belief to preach to the heathen, and the consequence has been the estrangement from the American Board of the many ministers and churches in sympathy with their doubts. It is questionable, therefore, whether the Japanese Christians themselves would not maintain the standard of orthodoxy as well as it would be kept up by the graduates of skeptical theological seminaries whom the American Board is likely to send out as missionaries in the future. These schools are cultivating in their students a critical spirit similar to that which prevails among the Japanese. They are teaching them to distrust the authority of the Bible, and consequently of every doctrine and every dogma upon which Christian theology is founded. Really, these candidates for the ministry have no more faith than the skeptical Japanese, who are attracted rather by Western science than Western theology."

The zealous but ill-informed retainers of the church who boast so loudly of the growth of Christianity, of the number of Bibles circulated, and of their influence on civilization, would do well to take into consideration the facts mentioned by the Sun. Christianity, as a name, survives by the abandonment of about all that gave the name a distinct meaning in the ages of the past when the church ruled the European world. By adapting itself to the growing intelligence and humanity of the successive centuries, Christianity, in effect, yields all claim to be a divinely revealed religion. It admits that it is a growth, like everything else in the cosmos. Only the cowardice of business men and the subserviency of legislators keep alive the pretensions of the church to rule the world as the representative of the gods.

The Spread of Religion—Some Statistics.

When the ordinary political editor sets himself the task of defending religion or some particular church movement he reveals at once his non-acquaintance with the subject. He runs upon rocks that many religious editors are sufficiently good navigators to avoid. The editor of the New Orleans Item is an awful example to other newspaper men whom a copy of the United States Census reports on churches may tempt to play pilot to the ship of Zion. The Item of July 1 has an editorial on the "Spread of Religion." It starts out in this graduation-essay style:

"The subject of churches is one always possessed of interest to the world. We know there are some persons who are ever prepared to scoff when church is mentioned to them, but they make not up this great world; they are so insignificant a portion of it that they would not attract any attention were it not for the noise they make."

It would have occurred to a writer less enthusiastic and more careful that the churches themselves would not attract any attention "were it not for the noise they make." And, for that matter, neither would the editor of the Item.

The Item informs its readers that "religion from 1880 to 1890 has made great strides in the United States. Leading Protestant denominations, for instance, increased their membership forty-two per cent." We presume that the Item means to say that religion made great strides in the United States from 1880 to 1890. If that alleged forty-two per cent increase were real, and if it were the average increase of all the Protestant denominations, they might well feel somewhat jubilant, for the increase of the population of the country was only about twenty-five per cent in the same period. But only the "leading Protestant denominations," those having the most wealth and the most nearly perfect systems of proselytism, are claimed to show this degree of growth. What the actual growth of all or of any of these denominations was during the decade from 1880 to 1890 we have no official means of knowing. We have a United States church census for 1890, but none for 1880, so that an official comparison is impossible. Full preparations were made to take a church census in 1880, and a mass of facts was gathered, but before it was tabulated the appropriations were exhausted and "the results were wholly lost," says Rev. Dr. Carroll, statistician of the division of churches, census of 1890. For 1880, then, we have only the figures of the church officers. Those are also all we have in the census of 1890, for the United States enumerators had to depend upon the statements and lists furnished by the church officials, although in the latter case it is reasonable to suppose that there was not so great a tendency to exaggeration, owing to the fact that it was known that the figures would be subjected to the more or less critical examination of the government officers. Careful men must naturally be distrustful of claims made by church people since the revelations concerning the shameful stuffing of the petitions for the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday. Rev. Dr. Rainsford says, speaking of this matter of church statistics:

"Hundreds of thousands who never darken the doors of a church are set down as church members. In the census returns many persons are counted over and over again. I myself know one man who is set down as an attendant by seven different churches."

In these days of latitudinarianism there must be very many who are counted as attendants of many churches, for they go alternately to various services in search of the "truth" or of amusement.

The Item says in one paragraph that the number of church buildings was doubled from 1870 to 1890, and in the next it gives the number of church sittings as 44,000,000, which, it adds, "is greater by fifty per cent than is called into requisition." So, then, the people pay the taxes for the churches on twice the number of church buildings that are needed! Is this outrageous injustice anything of which to boast? According to this statement, there has been no necessity for the vaunted doubling of churches since 1870. But this is not all of the story: While the census of 1890 gives the total of church membership in the United States as 20,618,307, and Dr. Carroll figures from this a church adherence for the Protestants and Catholics of 56,992,000, there are no figures to show how great or small is the average Sunday attendance at services. That person must be very credulous and non-observant who believes that more than one person in five of the whole population of the country goes to church on Sunday, which would make an average attendance, by the census of 1890, of 13,000,000, in round numbers, leaving more than 30,000,000 sittings unused every Sunday. When it is remembered that the church depends upon the state to tax the citizens at a rate sufficiently increased to make up for the exemption of her property from taxation, it is easy to understand why the religious organizations are so prodigally supplied with seating facilities, but it does not explain why the secular papers are willing to brag about the dishonest extravagance of the church officials.

The New Orleans paper says that "the Catholic church is the richest as well as the strongest numerically." This is a mistake, accepting the census figures, as the Item does. These show that all divisions of the Catholic church own property to the value of $118,371,366, all divisions of the Methodist church to the value of $132,140,179, and of the Presbyterian, $94,869,097.

"Colonel Ingersoll and others of the Agnostic school will not find any comfort in the figures we have given. The record presented to them is proof positive that their peculiar views are not having that effect upon the world which they had hoped would be produced. Religion is too strong for Bob Ingersoll. He is a man of remarkable ability, but in religion he has an opponent so entirely too powerful for him that at no stage of the battle is he ever in it."

That is the concluding paragraph of the Item's editorial. The editor seems to have forgotten several very important things. He has forgotten that Christianity has been the established religion since the beginning of the Fourth century, and for ages it held the world in the bonds of the worst despotism that ever oppressed the human race, suppressing every manifestation of new thought with all the terrible resources of torture and slaughter at its command, extirpating the doubters, the thinkers, the scientific discoverers, systematically preserving the mentally and morally unfit, breeding a race of cowards and believers fit only to be dupes and slaves. He has forgotten that, even in America, the church has laid the hand of civil oppression on the investigator and done all in her power to make silent conformity and loud-mouthed hypocrisy fashionable and profitable, and earnest inquiry and honest expression shameful and unprofitable. He has forgotten that the church, in flagrant defiance of the Constitution, has exempted its wealth from equitable taxation, has thrust its state-paid chaplains into legislative halls and public institutions, has caused presidents and governors to give official recognition to Theism and Christianity, has burdened public education with the incubus of sectarian instruction, has shut Atheists out of the jury box and off the witness stand, has imposed her barbarous moral code on all the people, has denied, by statute the opportunity to investigate the most vital of social problems, and has forced the people to do reverence to the Catholic holy day, Sunday, robbing them when it could of one-seventh of their time, and fining and imprisoning those who dared think and act for themselves. He has forgotten that sure progress is always slow, and that it is not the work of one century, nor of five, to change the mental habits and emotional aspirations of a race. He has forgotten that Christianity itself is but a composite of earlier religions, its "redeemer" but the replica of many preceding virgin-born "saviors." He has forgotten that Protestantism is constantly weakening in doctrine, that she survives by preaching that which was unknown to her founders, and slurring the dogmas that were the essence of her creeds in the old days. He has forgotten that the once "Universal Church" is now split up into warring factions, and that out and beyond them all are multitudes who owe allegiance to none. He has forgotten that the discoveries of the men of science and the investigations of archaeologists, philologists, and literary and historical critics have so discredited the Protestant Infallible Oracle, the Bible, that its worshipers can appeal to it as an authority only by reading into it statements, doctrines, and meanings that would have been indignantly repudiated by Christians no more than a century ago, and the assertion of the presence of which in the Bible would, not so very much longer ago, have earned for the asserter the rack and the flame-encircled stake, for his property confiscation, for his family attainder and expatriation. The editor of the Item has forgotten that neither Colonel Ingersoll nor any other Freethinker of sense has expected to prove strong enough to overthrow the church in one generation or in ten. But he has also forgotten that Colonel Ingersoll and the rest are civilizing all the creeds of the church, are winning from it its clearest brains and its warmest hearts—are, in conjunction with the men of science and the secular reformers, filling the foremost periodicals, and even the newspapers, with contributions that are alien if not always hostile to the letter and spirit of the Christian creed; and that it is a very small and very sectarian college that does not every day instruct the young in facts and principles that are undermining the whole Christian structure.

In Pursuit of "The First Cause."

The theological mind has never been content to study nature and become acquainted with verifiable facts. Secondary causes are all that have heretofore been discovered, but the theologian has always deemed it more important to search for a "first cause," notwithstanding that all that has been of service to man has come through patient investigation of nature, regardless of the possibility or the impossibility of finding that ever receding "first cause." Like the mythical pot of gold at the foot of the rainbow, the "first cause" continually eludes our grasp. But the theologian is a Bourbon—he learns not, neither does he forget. He may call himself a Liberal Christian, and be indeed very broad and liberal in regard to most religious conceptions and systems, but when you come to "God," to the asserted intelligent "first cause," he as hopelessly loses his grip on logic and induction as does the Catholic or the Calvinist.

In The New Unity of July 12 "R. A. W." discourses on Law. He says that "the doctrine of universal law has come to stay," and that the "ecclesiastical council that some time since voted evolution untrue rivaled the temerity of the Pope who issued a Bull against the comet." He continues:

"Now this idea of law has its valuable and corrective ministry to modern religious thought, and can only do permanent harm to faith if the church and pulpit have no real and modifying truth to set over against it in such a way that the idea of God and the idea of law are seen to run together. God is to be conceived of as in law, implicated in its every process, yet without doing injustice to the personality of the one, or the reality of the other."

That is, the recognition of cause and effect as potent in the universe will not harm the church of supernaturalism if the concept of natural cause and effect is nullified in men's minds by the injection of the supernatural "God," or "first cause." The trouble is that almost all men except some students of science think that what the naturalist calls "law" is the same thing as that which the legislator calls law. Of course there is no likeness between the two. The naturalist's law is subjective, being only the token-term by which he designates the observed sequence of causes and effects. The legislator's law is an arbitrary rule, imposed from without, which may be either obeyed or disobeyed. But that which the scientific thinker calls natural law cannot be disobeyed, for every cause will produce its effect. "The idea of god and the idea of law" are not "seen to run together" by those who recognize this fact, for the harmonious interference of an intelligent supreme power with cause and effect is inconceivable. If the sequence of cause and effect remains unbroken, the alleged intelligent supreme power is useless, but if that sequence is broken, then the conception of universal law, that is, of the infinit prevalence of cause and effect, falls to the ground.

"God is to be conceived of as in law, implicated in its every process," says "R. A. W.," seemingly forgetting that that makes god a partner in every crime in the universe, implicating him in every wrong committed against man or other sentient creature, during the measureless reaches of eternity. If, as we are told, "law [is] the method of divine action," then God is not merely the partner in crime, he is not simply implicated with "law" in the wrongs we, with our kindred, suffer, but is the sole "first cause" of invasion and suffering. We do not find moral or immoral purpose in nature considered as a whole, for we do not find conscious intelligence in nature considered as a whole; but if a conscious God is predicated, to whom law is the "method of action," who has "plans" and "intentions," we cannot escape the conclusion that he designed that we should suffer as we do; that he created all the fierce and poisonous forms of life to do just as they do; that he made some men to be cruel ravagers of the world and the millions to be their victims, and that he created man weak and ignorant that he might fall helpless and agonized into the insatiable maw of the remorseless nature which was made by "the infinit power that makes for righteousness."

"An intelligible law without an intelligent law-giver is as much an anomaly to right thinking as an orderly world without law. Law explains nothing as to the first cause of things. It is a method of manifestation or orderly procedure, and, even when implicating, as it usually does in common usage, the forces thus manifested and acting, carries in fact only the dignity of a secondary cause. Evolution, the comprehensive law, is impotent at the very point where the mind most persists in being enlightened. There is every indication that the evolutionary philosophy must summon the idea of God or find itself in the predicament of the ancient conception that the earth was carried on the back of an elephant—which did very well for a time until some curiosity monger wanted to know what the elephant stood on."

If one is determined to conceive of natural law as something imposed from without, then it is true that it is inconceivable that there should be law without a law-giver. But when it is understood that "law," in nature, is simply the name we give to the observed succession of causes and effects, that order is inseparable from matter, then we cease to associate the operations of nature with an extraneous law and law-giver. We perceive that it is impossible that different bodies should cease to have relation, and that so long as they have relation we necessarily say that that relation is orderly, that is, it is in accordance with "law." Oil floats upon water, and we say that it is the "law" that it should do so, but if the fact were reversed and water floated upon oil we should still say that it was the "law." We forget that in the nature of things two bodies must have relation to each other and that what we call "law" is the effect, not the cause, of that relation.

"Law explains nothing as to the first cause of things." Manifestly not. So far as the human mind is able to conceive, the chain of causes and effects is unending and therefore a "first cause" is as unthinkable as a last effect. "Law," instead of carrying "only the dignity of a secondary cause," has simply the significance of a thought-symbol, indicative to the initiated of the observed succession of phenomena alike in appearance or effect.

"R. A. W." thinks that evolution without "God" is like the ancient conception of the earth resting on the back of the elephant—"which did very well for a time until some curiosity monger wanted to know what the elephant stood on." Exactly, and then the Theists of that time put a tortoise under the elephant, not thinking far enough ahead to see that the tortoise needed a support as badly as the elephant had done. So "R. A. W." wants to put the tortoise "god" under evolution as an explanation of the cosmos, never realizing that "God" needs a support in turn, and that though you put twenty gods in succession under each other you would have no more secure foundation than the old theological geographers had when they put the tortoise under the elephant and thought they had the earth securely fixed in place. It is incomprehensible what ever possessed "R. A. W." to make use of such a self-evidently boomerang argument as that:

"The mystery of a first cause remains untouched and is as clamorous for an answer as when the Indian sages wrestled with the same problem beneath the shadows of the Himalayas."

Undoubtedly, and the mystery of a last effect is precisely as clamorous. As the destruction of matter is inconceivable, so is its creation, and if not creatable, where is the necessity for the "first cause," so-called? If it is incapable of destruction, all must admit that the pursuit of a last effect is folly, no matter how "clamorous"—in the ears of the theologian—the "mystery" may be. And if it is uncreatable, the search for the first cause is equally foolish. In the meantime, we will study nature in order to find truths, not to answer conundrums.

"Science has not yet said a better thing than the Hebrew sages said two thousand years ago or more: 'In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth.'"

It is certainly indefinite enough as to time and positive enough as to alleged fact to satisfy the Theist, but it gives us absolutely nothing in the way of information, and it has been the cause—or one of the causes—of the shedding of rivers of blood and the lighting of millions of martyr fires. Science, on the other hand, has mapped the solar system, has given us improved agriculture, shelter, clothing, ships and railways and telegraphs and telephones, harnessed electricity, drained swamps, conquered many diseases, put into our hands all the means of culture that we possess, and, in short, raised us from inarticulate animal to man. Whatever science may have said, we are here as civilized men and women because of what she has done, and the least beneficent thing that she has done is of more worth to the race than the barren, unprovable assertion, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth," a million quintillion times repeated.

Mr. Moody's Admissions and Mistakes.

Evangelist Moody has recently been in Toronto, and he professes to be delighted with the Toronto Sunday. During an address in that city he made some admissions that may hereafter come back to plague the Sabbatarian party. He told his auditors that if they had any desire to give up Sunday to recreation, all they needed to do was to run down to Chicago and remain thirty days, at the end of which time they would return thoroughly cured and willing to cut off their right hands before they would vote for a freer Sunday. Mr. Moody should have said that that might be the effect on Sunday worshipers, but that there were many people in Chicago and other parts of the country, including Toronto, who had seen both the Chicago and the Toronto Sunday, and would not under any consideration exchange the former for the latter.

"The workingmen would make a great mistake if they should give up the Sabbath and let it go for a day of recreation," says the evangelist. Pshaw,

Mr. Moody; be candid. You know that no one is compelled to take part in Sunday amusements. No one is going to seize you by the collar and drag you to the theater, the museum, the ball play, the park, or the seashore. You are at perfect liberty to go to church or remain at home. If you should come to New York next Sunday there is not a policeman in the city who would once think of arresting you and taking you down to Coney Island and forcing you to enjoy yourself. But there is another side to the story. On a recent Sunday the steamers and cars running to Coney Island from this town took down more than 50,000 people, and many others who wanted to go could not get transportation in time. If you and the other Sabbatarians could have your way those 50,000 men, women, and children, with the hundreds of thousands that went to other resorts, would be kept cooped up in their homes every Sunday the year round. You are not willing that they shall enjoy themselves in their own way, but they are perfectly willing that you shall do as you please on Sunday, providing you please to mind your own business.

Speaking of the ante-horse car and Sunday newspaper days in Chicago, Mr. Moody says: "I remember how those horse cars got to running; it was to accommodate the church-going people." Exactly, and so the selfishness of Christians having availed to open the way for the improvement of the condition of those outside the churches, those within the pale are clamoring to the authorities to stop the cars. "They have emptied the churches, and all the steamboats and barges are employed on Sundays carrying excursions." Ah, that is the trouble, of course. The Sunday cars "have emptied the churches." That tells the story, and explains the grief of the Sabbatarians. They are not able to compete in a fair field with the excursion trains, the shadowy woods, the cool ocean breezes, and so, rather than see the people happy in their own way, they would stop the cars and the boats and force everybody to choose between Sunday confinement in their rooms and listless watching of the threshing of theological straw in the churches.

Mr. Moody affirms that he believes that "the greatest curse we have in America to-day is our Sunday newspapers," and he adds that he thinks the New York Sunday dailies "have done as much harm as Tammany." They have done harm to the extent that they have catered to popular ignorance and prejudice, but in this respect they are no worse than the week-day editions, nor are they worse than the religious weeklies and monthlies; in fact, they are not so bad as the denominational organs, for there are many men of independent minds on their editorial staffs, and they manage to tell much needed truth, in spite of the smothering tendencies of the counting rooms. For instance, the leading papers of the country did splendid service during the fight over the proposed closing of the gates of the Columbian Exposition on Sunday. But we forget—this work of theirs did not find favor in the eyes of Mr. Moody.

The average grand jury is a body of Solons. One of these groups of wiseacres in Denton, Tex., recently indicted thirteen society people in that town for playing progressive eucher. The judge before whom the cases were called promptly nollod them. We should like to know if these grand jurors are representative of the communities from which they are drawn. If they are, we are not yet ready for the referendum; we will take our chances with the average justice or judge.

"Let church and pulpit take science at its latest word. The time was never more auspicious than now to proclaim a Theistic interpretation of law, and strengthen faith by the very facts which seemed for a time to threaten its extinction. The necessity under which Christian thought finds itself of finding some counter-truth to the doctrine of law is its opportunity to base its doctrines of divine providence upon that which even the severest science will not question."—The New Unity.

So it seems that "Christian thought," instead of searching for the truth for the sake of the truth, is to hunt for an antidote to the "doctrine of law," for the purpose of strengthening faith in the unknown god! "Christian thought," it appears, is under the "necessity" of doing this if it would not perish. Certainly it deserves to perish, if such is its highest conception of scientific investigation.

Religious people say some queer things. At the Christian Endeavor meeting, in Boston, Chaplain D. H. Trebous, of the United States Navy, said that the world was "yet to be evangelized—just as it was discovered—by the men who go to sea." We have always understood that church adherents believed that God was the person who discovered the world. But perhaps Mr. Trebous meant to say that seamen from some parts of the world discovered other parts of it, and as Columbus the Catholic discovered America, it is to be presumed that our chaplain expects seamen of that faith to evangelize it. Well, they began in good shape in Mexico and Peru, murdering millions of the inhabitants and destroying two civilizations which were the superiors of their own in every respect except militarism.

"Our large churches are already loaded down with a dead weight of members who join the church simply from social considerations, without any doctrinal conviction, and with no idea whatever of being made useful, and of co-operating with the spiritual agencies of the church in the great and stupendous scheme of world-wide evangelization and conquest."—Rev. Otis A. Smith, in Christian Endeavor Convention.

Does the New Orleans Item think that the "leading Protestant denominations" should be jubilant over a forty-two per cent increase in membership in ten years, when they are "loaded down" with people who have joined them "simply from social considerations," and are "without any doctrinal convictions, and with no idea whatever of being made useful?" Need Colonel Ingersoll be driven to despair when his "opponent" is "powerful" in appearance largely because afflicted with fatty degeneration?

The Christian Advocate confesses that "the tendency is to infidelity among progressive Jews." The obstacles to the success of Protestant missions, it says, are the fanaticism of the orthodox Jews and the infidelity of the reformed Jews. Peculiar, is it not, that the "chosen people," the compatriots of the Son of God, should be the most difficult to favorably interest in the gospel and mission he is said to have preached and inaugurated. Why did "god" manage matters so bunglingly that the race of which the Christian editor, Dr. Buckley, is compelled to say what he does below almost unanimously reject Christianity?

"The Jews are the most interesting race upon the earth. Their history is unsurpassed for heroism, their character in all ages has displayed the highest order of intellect and unsurpassed physical endurance, and, taking them as a whole, there is no race that can successfully contend with them in so large a number of spheres."

It would seem that such a people, if any, should have been able to understand and willing to accept a religion founded by a demi-god whose mother was a Jewess and whose twelve apostles were all Jews. If Dr. Buckley is right, and the Jews have "displayed the highest order of intellect," it follows, does it not, that the highest order of intellect persistently refuses to recognize the validity of Christian pretensions? That is what we think, but we are somewhat surprised that the Christian Advocate should so frankly admit the fact.

One of the most absurd pretenses of the enforcers of the Sabbath and the Sunday excise laws in this city—a pretense, by the way, which even the Evening Post is not above resorting to—is that it is necessary to rigorously enforce the law in order to "discipline" the police, who, under the old régime, permitted so many places to remain open, presumably because they were paid so to do. Let us see what, if anything, there is in this wonderful line of defense. Why was there corruption before? Because there was an attempt to shut up some of the places, and the police were induced to shut their eyes instead. Well, then, if a determined attempt is made to shut up all places, will not the temptations of the police be correspondingly increased?

As convictions must depend upon their testimony, and as the entire force is on Sunday transformed from a citizens' protective body into an army of spies and informers, will not every officer be put in the way of temptation? Under a decent secular order of things the police would be liable to be tempted only by the murderers, thieves, and other actual criminals. Under the present indecent Puritan order of things they are still liable to the temptations proffered by this class, and, in addition, to those that may be offered by tens of thousands of men and women whose business they are ordered to suppress because Sunday is the priests' day. How is the "discipline" of the force to be improved under such circumstances, saying nothing of the accompanying demoralization of the business men, peddlers, and the others tempted by this idiotic system of persecution to buy off their persecutors? The only way to prevent New York's Roman Catholic constabulary from blackmailing the business people is to repeal the Sunday laws under which they operate.

Judge Ball of Chicago fined Captain Anson and the other players of the Chicago baseball club $3 each and costs for playing ball on Sunday. The judge said that the man living near a baseball park had rights as well as other people. This is getting down nearer to the right principle, for it seems to hold that the "disturbance" must be actual, not theoretical, as in the case of the Adventists plowing in their back fields. But it is pertinent to inquire if Judge Ball would fine the members of the salvation Army squad under similar circumstances, or the pastor and sexton of a church whose bell disturbed the neighbors of the church. Would he be impartial enough to do this, or is religion privileged in Chicago as elsewhere? We fear that the latter is the real state of affairs, for Judge Ball declared that "citizens are entitled to a quiet Sunday," which gives the impression that he fined the ball-players for disturbing citizens on Sunday, not for disturbance per se, and that he would have acquitted them of blame if they had been accused of causing a disturbance on Monday or Saturday. We are unable to see that the nerves of people are any more sacred on Sunday than they are on other days, and we hold that if, on the pretext of protecting nerves from annoyance, a man is punished for doing that on Sunday which he is permitted to do on other days, it is really the day that is sacred, not the nerves of the citizen. The protection of the day from "desecration" is in fact the real object of all Sunday laws, whatever may be the specious pretext alleged to the contrary. Citizens can be protected from disturbance by general laws applicable to all days alike, and hence there is not the shadow of an excuse for special Sunday legislation, which is always a religious outrage in intention and a class injustice in practice.

The Wise Defense Fund.

We are pleased to be able to make the acknowledgments given below. It is a better showing than any heretofore presented. Mr. Wise must not go to prison for sending an excerpt through the mails to a preacher whose church, through its various branches, sends thousands of whole copies in that way every year: J. McArdle, 50 cents; W. J. Ribbley, $2.50; L. Walter, $1; S. Durant, $2; P. Selde, Sr., $1; E. B. Foote, $5; E. B. Foote, Jr., $5; H. Bernard, $1; A. T. McMillan, $1; G. W. Adams, $2; Mrs. E. Brundage, $1.85; Caroline L. Rich, $1; W. L. Nelson, $1; R. Schubert, $1; Chas. Gregg, $1; William Platts, $1; B. B. Rockwood, 70 cents; E. C. Slye, $1; S. Adamson, 50 cents; through Geo. Harrison, $16.40; L. G. Reed, $1; Geo. Longford, $1; T. Tripp, $10; Mark Rowe, $1; J. Chevullard, $1; Asa Smith, $1; Ed. Blair, $1; Mrs. Sarah Metzler, 50 cents; E. K. Mohler, $1.

Since the last acknowledgments were made in these columns we have received for the Flecken school fight in Minnesota the sums named below: E. O. Roscoe, $2; R. Schubert, $1; D. M. Worley, $1; R. B. Jackson, $5; Daniel McDonald, $1.50; J. P. Thornquest, $1; S. Brewer, $1; F. Heins, $1; Mrs. Sarah Metzler, 50 cents.

News and Notes.

The first impression one gets of Sheffield, as he rolls through on the railroad train, is that of a smoky, dingy manufacturing city, where it is impossible for anything like beauty to flourish. I was told when I came to Sheffield that there was nothing to see, only long rows of tenement houses and vast and gloomy buildings, lighted with the glare of furnace fires, in which a thousand busy hands sharpen cutlery for the world. But as a matter of fact, Sheffield is a handsome city, when you travel out of the smoke to the surrounding hills. There are five valleys in Sheffield, and five meandering streams here unite into the river Don. Quite a variety, therefore, appears in Sheffield. It is not a monotonous manufacturing place, where only smoke and steam fill the air, and nothing is heard but the rumble and roar of myriad machineries. From the crowded valleys where the vast business of the city is transacted, and where, indeed, the blue light of heaven is often shut out by the murky clouds that encircle the heart of the fiery metropolis, from these steaming and rushing centers of activity you come upon ample hills, beautiful green fields stretch away, groves and gardens glitter, and nature puts on her most alluring robe; and as you wander over these hills you advance into magnificent prospects, and no scenery in the world can surpass the loveliness and grandeur of what greets you in the vicinity of Sheffield. Somehow or other, Ruskin seemed to see the point, and he placed here one of the most charming, instructive, and valuable museums to be found anywhere. It is worth crossing the Atlantic just to view these wonderful treasures. And why did Ruskin place these priceless exhibitions of nature and art alongside the rush and bustle and dirt of Sheffield? Why not at Oxford or other quiet town with educational and artistic associations? Ruskin himself supplied the answer. He said that ironwork was a necessary art; that the cutler's art at its best, as manifested in Sheffield, is "unsurpassable by that of any living nation," and also "because Sheffield is within easy reach of beautiful natural scenery."

The Sheffield Corporation, not unmindful of the honor bestowed upon the city by Mr. Ruskin, purchased Meersbrook Hall for the home of the museum—a beautiful estate with old trees, and walls gay with roses and clematis, and in summer the haunt of blackbirds, thrushes, and rooks. It is in perfect accordance with the glories of the museum, which, though small, contains the most precious wealth of nature and of art. One could spend days in these little rooms, and yet ever find something new and entrancing to study and muse over. Every picture and cast on the walls, every book and print in the library, every stone in the mineralogical gallery, is selected for a special purpose, and in its own peculiar department each is the best that could be procured. The object of Mr. Ruskin was to educate the people in art. The mineral room simply astonishes one with its crystal splendors. There are "precious stones," from sapphires to diamonds, and from topazes to emeralds and opals. There is a unique example of a pale-blue form of topaz from the Ural mountains, associated with smoky quartz and mica. Perhaps there is nothing like it in the world. The iridescence of the opal is amazing, and you wonder that in the heart of nature, in "the dark unfathomed caves," such glorious hues could flash and flame. As you look into these beautiful crystals there seems to be opening upon you depths of color shining far away in ever-changing lustres while you pass from point to point and gaze into the resplendent chambers. I know of no place where more wealth of natural beauty is revealed.

The books are ancient—going back to 1160—and they display the exquisite art of those old days, and indicate with what a religious fervor the printers must have labored. These books are enriched with miniatures, scroll-work, and ornamental borders. Here are also many of the original drawings of Turner; a painting of the front of St. Mark's which it took the artist three years to complete, and many of the works of ancient Italian masters which can not be found even in their own land. I was surprised to find such a wonderful display amidst such beautiful surroundings, near the grimy machineries of toil. It shows that Ruskin had some deep insight into the heart of man, and that he saw the latent poetry and romance of human toil; that where man labors, even in dust and darkness, there are the possibilities of noblest things. One might spend days in Ruskin's museum and find instruction, for though the collection is not imposing, yet it is infinitely suggestiv, and leads one into a thousand pathways of thought and investigation.

Sheffield is not simply a hive of industry—a black mass of manufacturing facilities; it is a city with
